CONTENTS

Illustrations · xiii
Preface and Acknowledgements · xvii
Note on Values · xxi

CHAPTER 1

Introduction
1
The Dark Age of Currency?
2
The Dark Age of Money?
4
The Meanings of Money
7
Situating Early Medieval Money
11
Investigating Early Medieval Money
14
Sources and Approaches
17

PART I

CHAPTER 2

Bullion, Mining, and Minting
23
Tracing the Origins of Gold and Silver
25
Bullion, Profits, and Power
29
Circulation of Bullion: Dynamics
33
Imports of Bullion: Three Case Studies
36
Conclusion
45

CHAPTER 3

Why Make Money?
47
How to Make Coined Money
49
How Large Was the Early Medieval Currency?
50
Why Were Early Medieval Coins Made?
53
Fiscal Minting
55
Impermeable Borders
57
| CONTENTS |
|-----------------|-----------------|
| Renovatio Monetae | 61 |
| Private Demand | 67 |
| Conclusion | 71 |

CHAPTER 4

| Using Coined Money | 73 |
| Money and Gift-Giving | 75 |
| Making a Statement: Money, Status, and Ritual | 85 |
| Giving God, King, and Lord Their Due | 91 |
| Monetary Obligations | 106 |
| Credit | 106 |
| Fines and Compensation | 111 |
| Getting Whatever You Want: Money and Commerce | 115 |
| Markets and Prices | 116 |
| Elites and Coined Money | 123 |
| Peasants and Coined Money | 130 |
| Conclusion | 136 |

CHAPTER 5

| Money, Metal, and Commodities | 139 |
| Money and Means of Exchange | 141 |
| Coin and Bullion: Categories or Continuum? | 144 |
| The Social Dynamics of Mixed Moneys | 152 |
| Case Study 1: Northern Spain | 156 |
| Case Study 2: The Viking World | 160 |
| Case Study 3: Tang and Song China | 172 |
| Conclusion | 182 |

PART II

| The Roman Legacy | 187 |
| Later Roman Coinage: An Age of Gold | 189 |
“Money, the Cause and Source of Power and Problems” 194

Currencies of Inequality 198

“Caesar Seeks His Image on Your Gold”: Gold and the State 202

State and Private Demands in Dialogue 210

Conclusion 216

CHAPTER 7

Continuity and Change in the Fifth to Seventh Centuries 221

Getting By in a Time of Scarcity: Low-Value Coinage 223

Gold, Taxes, and Barbarian Settlement in the West in the Fifth and Sixth Centuries 232

Post-Roman Italy 237

New Gold 1: Merovingian Gaul 239

New Gold 2: Visigothic Iberia 246

New Gold 3: Early Anglo-Saxon England 253

Conclusion 258

CHAPTER 8

The Rise of the Denarius c. 660–900 262

From Gold to Silver 268

Questions of Origins 272

The Silver Rush c. 660–750 1: England 275

The Silver Rush c. 660–750 2: Frisia and Francia 282

Money and Power in the Carolingian Age 284

Agency in Carolingian Coin Circulation 284

Regional Distinctions in Coin Circulation 289

Minting and Royal Authority 294

Minting and Local Elites 297
CONTENTS

Southern England c. 750–900: A Parallel World? 308

The Kingdom of Northumbria 313

Conclusion 315

CHAPTER 9

Money and Power in the Tenth and Eleventh Centuries 317

At the Dawn of the Commercial Revolution? 318

A Monetising Economy 322

Money, Morality, and the Routinisation of Coin 326

Money, Markets, and Lands: Mechanisms of Monetisation 333

The Spread of the Penny 340

New and Old Mints c. 850–1100 343

Italy 345

West Francia 352

East Francia/Germany 366

England 376

Conclusion 388

CHAPTER 10

Conclusion: A Sketch of Early Medieval Money 392

Abbreviations · 401

Bibliography · 405

Index · 499
CHAPTER ONE

Introduction

As Europe descended into war in 1940, wondrous things began to emerge from beneath St. Peter’s Basilica in the Vatican. The decision to lower the floor of the crypt to make room for Pope Pius XI’s (1857–1939) sarcophagus uncovered a network of Roman tombs. One of these—a relatively humble one—supposedly belonged to St. Peter, and its location had dictated the unusual placement of the fourth-century basilica above it, on a hillside in the midst of a still-active cemetery. That tomb lay directly beneath the altar, several metres below the current floor level of St. Peter’s, and as they dug down toward it the excavators of the 1940s came across nearly two thousand coins. The largest concentration of them lay in the “Niche of the Palliums”: a recess immediately above the tomb of Peter. In the Middle Ages the niche was accessible from above, being where the clergy lowered down special strips of fabric, the pallia (a sign of papal favour given primarily to archbishops), so that they could touch the tomb of Peter and become contact relics. Evidently the niche was also where visiting pilgrims would throw offerings.

The coins from the Niche of the Palliums and other parts of the St. Peter’s excavations offer a cross-section of monetary history. They run in date from the Roman period to the sixteenth century. The early and late parts of this spread are well represented, but after the fifth century the quantity of coins drops off sharply. Only a tiny number of coins minted in the sixth to ninth centuries appeared: about fifteen in total, or less than 1 per cent of the overall assemblage. That figure gradually picked up in the tenth and especially the eleventh centuries and ballooned thereafter. There is no question that St. Peter’s remained accessible and frequented throughout the early Middle Ages. The coin finds from its innermost recesses constitute so many tiny acts of devotion, each a small spark of material piety that was once dropped away into the darkness. Visitors from across Europe chose to toss in coins from their distant homelands, making for an especially diverse assemblage. At the same time, these finds are also a rare barometer of coin-use over the longue durée. They point toward an important conclusion. The scarcity of early medieval coins below St. Peter’s does not reflect any retreat in the veneration of St. Peter. Rather, there simply were not as many coins around to be deposited by visitors.¹ This book is about why, even when there were so few coins around, people still made them and used them to give to St. Peter, to pay rents, or to spend at markets.

The Dark Age of Currency?

Not only were early medieval coins in short supply, but they typically consisted of gold and silver pieces of relatively high value. It was not possible to go out and buy one loaf of bread, one pint of beer, or one egg on the basis of the currency available between about the sixth and eleventh centuries in western Europe. In this respect the early Middle Ages compare poorly with the periods that sandwich it. Both the Roman and later medieval currency systems were much larger in scale and also catered to the needs of diverse groups and needs. In the Roman world, that had meant a wide range of coin denominations in copper alloy, silver, and gold. Different segments of this system fared better than others as direct Roman rule faltered in western Europe. Gold was, in some areas, hardly affected at all. The Roman gold solidus, and especially its fraction the tremissis, maintained a dominant position for centuries after the empire itself was gone. The keenest loss, from the point of view of most of the population, would have been the vast base-metal coinage, which was used for small transactions. There was not really anything to fill that gap aside from reuse of old Roman coins. Early medieval currency thus represented what had been the upper tier of Roman currency. Even the silver denarius or penny, which gradually supplanted the tremissis from the seventh century onward, may have been less valuable than its gold predecessor, but was still a coin of significant worth: Charlemagne in the 790s laid down that one of the silver denarii his currency generally consisted of should buy no less than 12 two-pound loaves of wheat bread,² while a gold piece of the same weight would have got no fewer than 144 loaves.³

¹ Serafini 1951; Toynbee and Ward-Perkins 1956; Kirschbaum 1959.
² Council of Frankfurt c. 4 (Boretius 1883, 74).
It should be stressed that this was very much a western European set of problems. Lower-value coinage could be found in the Byzantine and Muslim worlds (though not always in profusion), including southern Italy and, at least into the eighth century, other Byzantine enclaves further north. This was an age that glittered with gold and silver, all the more so for their isolation in an oppressive gloom that has tended to produce a negative outlook on early medieval coinage, at least as something that actually mediated exchange and stored value for most of the populace. The focus has fallen on what could not be done, and on the poor showing of early medieval coins relative to other periods or categories of material evidence. There are far more Roman coins, or far more pot sherds. For many observers, the retreat of the currency exemplifies the collapse of economic sophistication, even of “civilisation,” as Bryan Ward-Perkins put it with reference to Britain in the bleak aftermath of Roman rule.4 Henri Pirenne in the 1930s viewed the unimpressive Carolingian monetary regime as a signal of the emaciation of Mediterranean commerce and the involution of economic structures.5 More recently, Chris Wickham’s magisterial survey of early medieval economic and social structures left coinage out almost completely,6 and Jim Bolton set up the tenth- and eleventh-century coinage of England as a foil for the larger currency of subsequent times.7

One of the most influential attempts to explain what role coins actually did play under these circumstances came from Philip Grierson, who argued that post-Roman gold tremisses and Carolingian denarii hardly circulated at all.8 Nobody knew the numismatic material better than Grierson, and his work on coinage as an expression of power and an artefact of government neatly sidestepped its small quantity and supposedly negligible economic importance. Instead, the archaeological record as it stood in the 1970s and before led him to build a case for restricted, socially driven use. Coin finds at that stage were few and dominated by hoards and graves. It seemed only logical to picture these coins as the stuff of gift-giving and other socially embedded payments like fines, not buying and selling.9 The purse of Merovingian gold pieces included in the Sutton Hoo ship-burial became, for Grierson, a fee for the spectral crew of the ship, and

5. Pirenne 1939, esp. 242–47.
the Crondall hoard of the same period a wergild payment in waiting.\textsuperscript{10} Grierson set himself against prevailing wisdom on the subject, which tied coins to mercantile commerce,\textsuperscript{11} and turned for inspiration to Marcel Mauss’s seminal work on gift-giving.\textsuperscript{12} Law codes and narrative texts that mentioned coins seemed to fit that model too, focusing on use in ritual settings such as the settlement of fines.

\textit{The Dark Age of Money?}

Grierson’s openness to social scientific approaches helped him to avoid a cardinal sin of numismatically inclined scholars: that of taking coin-age as a measure of the penetration of money in society or of monetisation as a conceptual phenomenon. It was emphatically not either of those things. Even in the early Middle Ages, people thought extensively in terms of money. They measured the value of land, livestock, market goods, and even human life, honour, and spiritual devotions in pounds, solidi, and denarii or other units predicated on weights of precious metal. In an important sense, this always was a highly monetised world. And with so few coins around, most “monetary” exchanges or obligations inevitably involved no coin at all: credit and commodities fulfilled that role, the latter sometimes so frequently or conveniently that they took on a role as a kind of money themselves. A weight of precious metal in the head did not necessarily translate to the corresponding sum of coins in the hand, even though superficially coins might seem to fit comfortably into the prevailing systems of account. Indeed, the exact relationship of coins to units of account is often difficult to grasp.\textsuperscript{13}

Marc Bloch once described medieval coinage as “something like a seismograph which does not only signal earthquakes, but sometimes causes them.”\textsuperscript{14} Given the limitations outlined earlier, the sensitivity of coinage as an economic seismograph needs serious scrutiny. This is not just a numbers game. A situation can be imagined in which there might be a relatively complex, dynamic exchange economy with few or no coins, such as the Viking-Age Baltic (though in effect silver bullion fulfilled many of the roles of coinage elsewhere, with less formal regulation). Conversely,

\begin{itemize}
\item[10.] Grierson 1961; 1970.
\item[11.] E.g., Pirenne 1925, 116, 244.
\item[12.] Mauss 1990 (originally published in French in 1925).
\item[13.] These points will be discussed in more detail in chapter 5.
\item[14.] “Quelque chose comme un sismographe qui, non content de signaler les tremblements de terre, parfois les provoquerait.” Bloch 1933, 1.
\end{itemize}
A surge in the production of coin is not necessarily symptomatic of an economy in good health, as in the Roman Empire of the third century, or mid-sixteenth-century England. All depends on context: on weighing up the nature of individual coinages and the societies in which they circulated. A safe starting premise, however, is that early medieval coins factored into a small to very small slice of economic activity. The question is who and what fed into that slice. As has been seen, Grierson believed that the limited practicality of early medieval coinage translated to narrow functionality. But this particular conclusion must now be left behind, in favour of one that takes account of significantly more layers of society and exchange. More recent assessments of coin use have turned away from Grierson and rehabilitated the more upbeat interpretation by Alfons Dopsch from the early part of the twentieth century. Dopsch situated his contribution as a late entry in the venerable debate on when a primitive, nonmonetary “natural economy” had given way to a “money economy” and landed firmly on the side of there being a money economy in the early Middle Ages, grounded in a dynamic rural economic landscape. He argued that coined money remained a pillar of post-Roman civilisation, even if in diminished quantity, with extensive evidence for its presence in circulation and thought; an approach that has also been juxtaposed with Pirenne’s emphasis on long-distance trade and its contraction after the seventh century.

One reason Dopsch’s conclusions about coinage have taken on a new sheen is the significant and unexpected growth of the underlying material record. Far more coins have come to light since the popularization of metal detectors in the 1970s, and some modern European countries (most notably England/Wales and the Netherlands) have created databases to log their finds and put them at the disposal of scholars. The results are revelatory: now it can be seen that early medieval coins did circulate in appreciable numbers. Pennies and even gold coins turn up far and wide, including in rural areas with no known claim to political or economic significance. This cannot be squared with a vision of currency as mostly the domain of elite gift-giving and a few intrepid long-distance traders.

16. Bloch 1967, 230–43 (originally published in French in 1939); Dopsch 1937, 358–83 (the longer version in the original German edition is Dopsch 1923–1924, 2:477–538). Others had reached similar conclusions in looking at specific areas: Giuseppe Salvioli (1901) had done so for Italy two decades earlier.
18. The historiography of this period is elegantly surveyed in McCormick 2001, 1–18. See also Naismith 2012b, 252–59.
Of course, those same detectors cannot be tuned to find only early medieval items, and for every one early medieval coin that comes to light, there will (at least in England and Wales) be fifty or more Roman ones, and fifteen or so later medieval ones. In relative terms the early Middle Ages are still very coin-poor, yet that poverty seems less absolute than once appeared to be the case.

We are still dealing with a knot of contradictions, albeit slightly different ones. Early medieval coins were used for many things by lots of people, albeit not often. A basic tool of day-to-day life became a rare commodity, access to which was contested and tenuous, expressing gulfs in status and social connections. It might be argued that money was always thus, and contemporary experience has led researchers to emphasise its status as a kind of social relation. What is needed is a recalibration of expectations regarding when, why, and on whose terms coins were used. From this point of view, coined money can be argued to gain in significance when it lacks in quantity. Choosing to use coins was a calculated decision that said something about the nature of an exchange. Choice is an important concept here. Georg Simmel, in his still electrifying Philosophy of Money, stressed that freedom stemmed from using money. Instead of a peasant cultivator having to produce whatever commodity their landlord demanded, paying in money meant they could produce whatever they wanted, or at least whatever they could sell. One difficulty here is that choice assumes a ready flow of money, which created a large-scale form of equity and consensus structured around the handling and flow of money in the early medieval situation, but that equity and consensus existed only fleetingly, at the point of transaction. Before and after that moment, a constrained money supply offered vast scope for articulating inequality. Coined money’s notionally universal status worked against it, turning access into advantage. One party might have been able to demand a better price; for the other, using money may not have been a choice at all. Gender, age, status, location, and all sorts of other variables affected access to and use of money. Even if coin was free and fluid, the decision to use it, and often the decision about when and how much to hand over, was 19. These ratios derive from the totals recorded on the Portable Antiquities Scheme (PAS) for England and Wales, as of 8 August 2021: 282,141 Roman coins, 5,051 early medieval coins, and 76,517 later medieval ones (here meaning 1066–1509).

22. For an argument on the fundamental link between hierarchy and money (or, rather, debt) see Bell and Henry 2001; Henry 2004.
frequently not. What, exactly, might early medieval people have sought to say by using coins in this climate?

The Meanings of Money

The back and forth of money is so familiar that it is easy to think it has always and everywhere been the same. Certainly the concept is widespread, having developed independently in many cultures,\(^23\) and there is a long tradition of seeing the impact of money as universal, at least in the case of general-purpose money that could be used in all settings (in contrast to "special-purpose" moneys of more restricted function).\(^24\) All-embracing applicability—fungibility, as economists sometimes call it—is both the greatest strength and the greatest danger of money according to this line of reasoning. The theory is that, having the capacity to drip down into all contexts like a sociological acid, money will eat away at distinctions between them. Fear of money's potential to subvert, distort, and corrode the basic fabric of human society is of very long standing. Ecclesiastical satirists of the eleventh century fastened on it,\(^25\) and Shakespeare put a biting speech on the transgressive power of money into the mouth of Timon of Athens around 1606: “Thus much of [gold] will make black white, foul fair, wrong right, base noble, old young, coward valiant . . . this yellow slave will knit and break religions, bless the accursed, make the hoar leprosy adored, place thieves and give them title, knee and approbation with senators on the bench.”\(^26\) Two centuries later, Karl Marx used this passage to exemplify his thinking on money as a force for change, and similar lines were followed by foundational figures in the sociology of money, including Max Weber as well as Mauss and Simmel.\(^27\) General-purpose money stood out as a defining feature of modern society, its incitement to calculative abstraction at once both liberating and dehumanizing. Jacques Le Goff has more recently followed this logic backward, arguing that European society prior to about 1800 was distinguished by a more bounded form of monetary thought, shaped by moralizing and religious strictures on the proper and improper uses of money.\(^28\)

---

Le Goff implicitly hits on a deep problem in the macrohistory of money. If general-purpose money has a predictable, inevitable set of effects, why are they not visible in earlier times, when money had a similarly wide range of uses? One way of addressing this quandary has been to push back the history of “modern” money. Some medievalists have staked claims to the origin of monetary modernity or protocapitalism as early as the central Middle Ages. This reclaims a part of the medieval period for “proper” economic history but at the same time leaves what came before as historical static, a sorry shuffle to set before the march of progress. That approach is rejected here. Early medieval money and coin are interesting in themselves, for their dogged continuity, and also for what that continuity implies. People continued to find needs and uses for currency, even in the restricted form of the era. And the degree of restriction varied considerably. In England, Francia, and Frisia between about 660 and 850, and a larger area from the late tenth century onward, coin was relatively common. Coined money can be read as a transregional phenomenon that spanned seas and continents, but also, and arguably more important, as a function of local hierarchies and economic infrastructures: part of what John Haldon has described as the core skeleton that underlies the soft tissue of society. For this reason, coinage is in some ways a good seismograph for other developments within a society, in that even modest growth in use tends to accompany higher degrees of social and economic elaboration—with the important caveat that for this period coinage needs (as will be seen) to be read as a reflection primarily of the economic dominance of elites over other groups in society.

Was this a “money economy”? In its way, certainly. As Michael Postan noted already in the 1940s, historians tend to approach the emergence of a “money economy” as a deus ex machina that swoops in at a point that suits their own needs and invented criteria. One way to break from that cycle is to recognise that different forms of money economy have prevailed over time, to be considered on their own merits rather than measured against an imaginary real money economy. A flexible approach of this kind was implicit in Weber’s thinking on money as a technology of power that could be used in varied ways to achieve control (Verfügungsgewalt), meaning that it was experienced in different ways by various social groups and also enmeshed with other kinds of power and dominance.

31. Postan 1944, 123, 124.
32. Weber 1968, 179.
That said, another strategy has been to query whether modern money really is all it has been claimed to be. The classic studies mentioned earlier were rooted in the aggressive industrial capitalism of nineteenth- and early twentieth-century Europe. But even in one of the crucibles of modern capitalism, the United States at the turn of the twentieth century, money did not always have the anticipated effects: Viviana Zelizer has shown that dollars and dimes were not all treated equally by urban wage labourers and their families. Money did not dissolve these households, the personhood of those who lived in them, or the boundaries between the different kinds of exchange they engaged in.33 The concept of money as corrosive and dangerous grew up in a very specific cultural and intellectual ecosystem: one of rapid, disturbing social and economic change, on the one hand, and of growing concern with abstraction and the breakdown of barriers between humans and things, on the other. The latter has been argued to have its own distinct intellectual pedigree, linked to aspects of Protestant intellectual tradition.34 In other words, a distinct kind of money economy (itself with variable real-life effects) and a specific way of looking at it have been taken as universal, when in fact they were highly particular.

Underlying the approaches to money outlined here is the effect money has on society. But economic processes need not be approached just as detached, impersonal forces: they are the product of, as well as an influence on, currents in thought and society.35 It is therefore just as important to examine what societies do to money.36 Views on the effects of general-purpose money have moved on from what Zelizer calls the “hostile worlds” scheme, meaning one that sets a supposedly inviolate traditional sphere against a threatening modern and monetary one.37 Those who have tried to put their finger on broader patterns in the impact of money have shifted to how it factored into long- or short-term “transactional orders,” or “modalities of exchange” like sharing between family groups, deferred gift-giving, or market trading.38 This is effectively a death blow to the idea that money—even general-purpose money—has a single social outcome. Many Pacific Island societies have embraced general-purpose money enthusiastically and integrated it into traditional forms of exchange; the potential for destabilization is there but is not activated by money in and of itself, instead depending on a range of political and economic factors.\textsuperscript{39} Most recently, the focus has pivoted to how materiality and social networks continuously reinvent money’s significance in different situations. In modern Vietnam, dollars and local money play complementary roles that are embedded in display and family dynamics.\textsuperscript{40} Digital money in modern Africa has a material form in the technology needed to access it, and a human dimension in that it creates much-desired institutional and financial identity.\textsuperscript{41} Embedded local developments carry as much interest as abstracted universals. The message is that what people do to money matters as much as what money does to people.

---

37. For this term see Zelizer 2005.

Two of the most stimulating recent assessments of money as a wider phenomenon exemplify this principle and combine the sweep of the big picture with the finesse of finely detailed examples. Tellingly, both acknowledge the painful awareness of money’s fragility and artificiality brought on by the financial crash of 2008. David Graeber has examined money as one example of the coercive machinery erected to enforce obligation or debt, from ancient Mesopotamia to the twenty-first century. From this perspective, coins represent a material form of credit relations in morally, socially meaningful packaging.\textsuperscript{42} Christine Desan has looked at a deep and well-evidenced case study, England from the seventh century onward, in which money emerged as a tool for mediating between institutions and the population. Like Graeber, Desan saw its underlying basis as a promise to repay debts, especially those owed to or from the state.\textsuperscript{43} The latter’s role quietly transformed at the end of the seventeenth century: money became something that the government issued without charge in order to stimulate and reward profit-oriented commerce, in effect making money fuel for capital and the market rather than a responsibility of public power created in return for a fee. These two works each take a functional approach to money, viewing it not just as an abstraction, but as something dynamic and open to modification. Graeber and Desan recognise that money was not monolithic, and that it gains in interest when the multiplicity of its effects is recognised, as a proxy for how groups and individuals mediated material value.

\textsuperscript{39} Akin and Robbins 1999, 20–25, and other papers in the same volume.
\textsuperscript{40} Truitt 2013.
\textsuperscript{41} Maurer 2015.
\textsuperscript{42} Graeber 2011.
\textsuperscript{43} Desan 2014.
Situation Early Medieval Money

There is perhaps a risk here of money as a historical phenomenon becoming submerged in a roiling froth of incommensurable special cases. It is therefore important to stress what made the early medieval example (or examples) distinct. Some of its qualities align closely with the anthropological interpretations previously outlined. Wealth given to the Christian Church for furtherance of its mission or charitable activities underwent something very like a leap from short- to long-term transactional orders, for example: money disposed of in this way metamorphosed from transient earthly dross to eternal treasure in heaven, as eloquently explored by Peter Brown.\textsuperscript{44} There was a remarkable degree of openness about the use of early medieval money. It is extremely difficult to identify sectors of thought and society that were hived off from monetary valuation or settlement in coin. Money could be used for more or less everything, so long as its context was made clear. Where there was anxiety, it was not about the use of money as such, but about whether its proper role as pious gift (or whatever) was correctly signposted. The performative aspect of using money, and by extension its materiality, therefore carried considerable weight.

Concern with presentation rather than the basic presence of money perhaps relates to one of the main differences between early medieval money and the examples anthropologists have concentrated on. Most of the latter relate to the introduction of modern, Western general-purpose money into traditional societies that already have well-established exchange mechanisms. The interest is in the impact of a new element. There was, in contrast, nothing new about money in early medieval Europe. It had been a fact of life from Britain to North Africa since the early Roman imperial period or before. That in itself might have been one reason for the ubiquity of money as a unit of account that related to coins and \textit{could}, but need not always, be represented by them: there was less prospect of money overwhelming ideas of propriety. What it offered was a kind of contained, instrumentalised transactional approach.

All this still leaves the question of why coins were made and used at all, especially if it was perfectly possible to get by without them. What did having some coins, but usually not many of them, actually achieve? Part of an answer lies in their connotations. Coins could be given to anyone for anything, backed up by trust that the next person would accept them at the same value. That was a serious principle in the early Middle Ages, and not one that could be taken for granted: rulers from the sixth century onward enacted legislation mandating that people had to accept good coins or, more revealingly, not refuse them, on pain of heavy punishment.\(^45\) By extension, coins thus reflect acceptance of the authority behind them, emblematized by the more or less carefully engraved name, image, or symbol of the ruler.\(^46\) This is true of state-sponsored moneys across history, and in modern times currency forms part of a multifaceted state-building project: people see, hear, and touch many other manifestations of central authority.\(^47\) This was not the case in the early Middle Ages. Manifestations of state authority were far fewer, and their impact slighter, the further one moved in social terms from the centre. For the typical early medieval peasant, coins would not have been just a minor prop in a complex edifice constituting royal and central power: they were one of the few visible, direct ways in which that infrastructure impinged regularly on people's lives. To deal in coins, then, was to deal with others as common members of the same ideological project—to enter into what Jonas of Orléans in the 820s called the “willing compact of seller and buyer” (\textit{pactio vendentis et ementis grata}).\(^48\) Coined money reified the means of exchange and cast the participants into a scheme of values closely and clearly dependent on authority, power, and social relations: they needed to be able to believe that the next person to whom they offered the coins would accept them at the same value. Coins created a sense of transactionality, that one thing had been given for another in a discrete and concrete act of exchange. In a sense this is “hostile worlds” turned on its head: instead of the detached nature of coin consuming everything it touched, people involved in diverse kinds of exchanges and power dynamics instrumentalized the finite, transactional quality of money, using it to frame different ways in which value changed hands. Use of coined money hence had a demonstrative, public quality to it. It was a way of defining and encapsulating value that could be taken up in any kind of exchange. In the immediate context of a transfer of goods or services, coined money might be seen as introducing a degree of fairness and transparency, even though on a larger level it was anything but.\(^49\)

\textsuperscript{44} Brown 2012; 2013; 2015.

\(^{45}\) See chapter 4.
\(^{46}\) An idea developed by Georg Friedrich Knapp (1924).
\(^{48}\) See chapter 4.
\(^{49}\) Feller 2017b, esp. 78–80. This duality is elegantly brought out in Kuchenbuch 2019, esp. 64–65, 69.
The embedded transactionality of early medieval money tempered Simmel’s famous idea of it bringing freedom and equality. It was there: an English monk of the early eleventh century saw the attraction of silver coins being that “one who has coins or silver can get everything he wants.”

Paying rent in coin meant peasant tenants had a degree of autonomy in what to cultivate and an inducement to deal in coin on their own account. But in a situation where money reflected larger power structures, it served and benefited whoever loomed large in them. In the early Middle Ages, that meant landholding elites first and foremost. There was little or no bureaucracy separate from them. Government generally remained local, vested in dominant groups, with larger-scale governance being a matter of negotiation between locally powerful elites and the ruler’s immediate entourage. The scale of elite wealth and power varied and included an important indirect element as patrons and powerbrokers for others, but the role of elites as both the major holders of local resources and the primary agents of the state had important consequences in relation to exchange systems, and especially coined money.

Cui bono is the essential question. Early medieval western European coinage did not work according to the same logic as that of the Roman Empire, or for that matter its eastern (Byzantine) successor or the Muslim world. There, the manufacture and distribution of coin remained within a more detached, bureaucratic framework. Access to fresh coin depended on direct involvement with the machinery of the state. Like other mechanisms once associated with more centralized government, the impetus behind the manufacture and initial distribution of coinage in the post-Roman West gradually came to depend on locally vested power structures. Elites and their needs therefore played a critical role in minting, either on their own account or as the arm’s-length agents of the state. This is not quite the same thing as private minting, though in practice it could come close. In effect, elites were in a position both to set and to play by their own rules when it came to the use of coined money.

One distinction that helps clarify the consequences of this dynamic is between primary and secondary uses of coin. Primary refers to the demands that precipitated minting, and the uses to which those new coins

---

51. Innes 2000, looking at the Carolingian example.

52. A cogent and lucid study of elites and commercial exchange is Wickham 2021.

54. Cf. Hudson 2020, who explores this point with reference to debt relations.
were first put. Secondary refers to everything that happened subsequently. It is of course not always possible to distinguish the two in practice. But there was a real difference between them. Most uses of coin did not require freshly minted tremisses or denarii. When kings or others were in a position to dictate terms (such as fines or tributes paid directly to them, or money for the maintenance of armies), they might demand fresh coin of a specific type. But broadly speaking, access to fresh coin was an exclusive privilege, restricted to—or at least channelled through—elites. In contrast, those who depended on the coins in circulation often faced an uphill struggle in getting what they wanted or needed. Most references to nonelite engagement with coin certainly or probably reflect secondary usage (e.g., obtaining necessary coins from market trading). But not even all members of the elite had ready access to coin: loans in cash generally took place within the elite and suggest deep imbalances in the distribution of cash even at that level.

Coined money in early medieval Europe was not just a neutral, fungible means of exchange. It carried a large social premium, and at any one time most coins in circulation were probably concentrated in very few hands, meaning that secondary users of coin had a small slice of an already small pie available to them.

Investigating Early Medieval Money

The final parts of this introduction address some of the essential preliminaries to what is to come. The chronological starting point is the later Roman Empire, and subsequently the collapse of central Roman rule, along with Roman ways of making and distributing coined money. Both of these changes were drawn out and affected various regions at different times, mostly within the fifth century, though Italy and North Africa arguably remained within a Mediterranean Roman sphere for rather longer. At its other end, the close of this study comes roughly around 1100. Demographic and urban growth reached new heights in the twelfth century, especially its second half, at about which time the supply of coined money also started to expand radically, partly on the back of major new silver mines being tapped in central Europe. These are interlocking developments and, as with their precursors in the eleventh century, are best explained as an ensemble. But together they represent the beginning of a quantum leap in terms of access to coin. This is an important story, though it is one that is best told separately. The point here is to concentrate on the more qualified role of money in the earlier Middle Ages, and to show that it was in many ways less different than might initially be thought.

Three pivotal shifts can be isolated in this period, though they did not start or finish everywhere at the same time. The first was the end of Roman monetary organization, which tended to follow the end of central Roman rule, albeit not always immediately. This entailed the effective cessation of new base-metal coinage and the dominance of gold, which survived in relatively rude health as the workhorse of regional fiscal systems. It also attenuated and eventually broke the fiscal axis that supported a large proportion of Roman minting. The second sea-change was the move from gold to silver as the principal component of the currency. This began on the shores of the English Channel in the later seventh century and spread soon after into Francia and the rest of England. Here, the advent of the penny meant a boom in the minting and use of coin. The new denomination took considerably longer to take hold in Italy (toward 8oo), where the penny had less effect on use and production, while—with the exception of Catalonia—it did not take hold in Christian Iberia at all until the eleventh century. From a fairly early stage silver pennies or denarii became identified more explicitly with the expression of royal authority: coins frequently carried the name and title of the current ruler, which had not been so common in the immediately post-Roman centuries when the visual point of reference was still the imperial coinage itself. This role as a metallic mouthpiece for rulers stimulated, and developed alongside, important changes in the manufacture of coinage, as elites took on new roles in the minting system—more or less directly in the Frankish world, and probably indirectly in England. The third main shift leads on from the second and took place in the later tenth and eleventh centuries. It consisted of a widespread and noticeable upturn in the use of coin, visible from Rome to England in both finds and written references to the use of coin.56 This has in the past been seen as essentially a reaction to new supply, specifically the opening of new silver mines in Germany. Fresh supplies of bullion were indeed important, yet the sources they came from were generally already known and just exploited on a larger scale; they point, therefore, to an intensification of demand. Strengthening local appetite for coin, encroaching into areas of economic action where it had before been a smaller element, was a leitmotif of this era. A change on such a large scale cannot and should not be pigeonholed in a moncausal niche. There were different regional conditions in play. But a common and important element was more aggressive elite intervention in the human landscape. Even regions that had, in terms of money and exchange, previously marched to the beat of their own drum were touched by this last upsurge: the Scandinavian kingdoms, together with several kingdoms in central and northwest Europe. Most had in earlier times known imitative coins, or silver bullion as a means of exchange; what changed was a reorientation of means of exchange into the purview of ruling elites and their allies.

56. Coins also started to be used on a larger scale in northern Europe too, in Ireland and Scandinavia for example, though this development stems from a different background. See chapter 9.

To be clear, this is primarily a book on Western Europe, with selective extensions to the north and into the Mediterranean. There are several reasons for this focus. Especially as Roman ways of making and handling money receded, there were important points of contact between England, the Frankish lands, and central and northern Italy. Similar sources occur in these regions and show comparable developments, which extended by the eleventh century into what Chris Wickham has called “outer Europe,” meaning Ireland, Scandinavia, and parts of central and eastern Europe (chapter 9). These areas are not all the same by any stretch of the imagination, but they are different in ways that can be used to make meaningful observations.

There is still value and interest in focusing on this part of Europe. Yet it is increasingly apparent that this is not the only direction from which the subject might be approached. Western Europe was also just one corner—and generally a poor corner—of a large, loose, and long-standing sphere of cultural and economic contacts; one that embraced Central and Eastern Europe along with the whole Mediterranean, modern Iraq, Iran, Central Asia, and parts of Africa, as well as Central and Eastern Europe. This was only a unity in the broad sense that its segments sometimes impinged on one another in relation to bullion and coin, either directly or indirectly. At times that effect could be large and impressive, as with the vast haul of Islamic silver dirhams that flowed some 5,000 km from the Caliphate to the Baltic (chapters 2 and 5). Another tack is to acknowledge that there were important similarities in how various monetary economies worked, meaning that comparisons between (say) the Geniza merchants’ handling of coin as part of their international trading network might trigger helpful insights into the circulation of coin in contemporary Northern 58. Global medieval history has grown rapidly to become a substantial field: a major series of studies is Holmes and Standen 2018; a good recent review is Ertl and Oschema 2022.

Europe, at least if one allows for a significant difference in scale (chapter 2). Indeed, taste for precious-metal coin was one of the few things that united most parts of this vast zone (though the viking world was a case apart in this respect). Gold or silver in the form of coin, or destined to play a monetary role, therefore offers a good lens through which to examine these “global” dimensions of the early Middle Ages, and to follow the cultural effects that often went with economic contacts. There are limits to this. Trade between far-flung regions within this vast Eurasian sphere was often tenuous, and some of the most important developments in this period came about precisely because those links broke down. Trade could also be “business only,” with negligible cultural impact from the region that supplied coins or bullion. Everything unfolded on a case-by-case basis and changed easily. Finally, all this is to home in on things or people that actually moved. It is possible to go even further by setting societies side by side that are similar in certain regards, and perhaps contemporary, but different enough to cast what is special about each into relief, as is done with Tang and Northern Song China in chapter 5. This exercise tells us something about the hierarchy of forms of money, and about state and private involvement with coin, but without any realistic prospect of the two areas having directly affected each other. China at this time had a much larger and more centralized monetary system overall than anywhere in western Eurasia.

Sources and Approaches

It is proper to come back down to earth by turning to the major categories of evidence that will be called on to pursue these developments within western Europe. Actual coins, and finds of coins, play a major part. Often, they are the only evidence available, and even when other materials survive, coins carry special value as a real part of the circulating medium. Coins must, however, be interpreted with care. There might be uncertainty on dating and attribution. Bigger problems are likely to arise in interpreting finds of coins. Various categories of find—hoards, and individual coins or clusters from amateur finds or archaeological excavations—reveal very different things. The main challenge is that present-day countries all have their own legal procedures for handling finds of coins. Some (e.g., England and Wales, or the Netherlands) are relatively relaxed and actively

---

59. This volume generally uses lowercase viking (rather than Viking) to emphasise that this was more of an activity or occupation than an essentialised identity or ethnicity.
encourage responsible amateurs with metal detectors to go forth and hunt for ancient artefacts; others (such as France, Ireland, Italy, and some German Länder and Swiss cantons) are much more protective, meaning that there is little or no legitimate metal detector use outside archaeological contexts. This is not the place to discuss the merits of the various systems, but it is appropriate to note that these highly divergent modern legal practices seriously impede comparisons between regions of Europe. To set England alongside Italy, for example, is simply not comparing like with like: England now has thousands of new coin finds logged on public databases each year by detector users, while Italy may well have at least as many coins to be found, but the only ones known to scholarship are a tiny number that occur in controlled archaeological excavations, and chance finds that are declared to the authorities. Disparity is not the only problem. Far from everything that is found gets recorded, even in regions with databases, and illegal detecting is a problem everywhere. Biases relating to limits of modern access also skew the sample: towns, heritage sites, military land, and national parks are off-limits, and coin finds in England tend to occur with surprising frequency in the vicinity of A-roads heading out of London, suggesting that the stomping grounds of detectorists play a significant part in shaping the apparent profile of circulation. The large samples recorded in England, Wales, and the Netherlands, despite their difficulties, remain the best indications of early medieval coin circulation as a general phenomenon and will be referred to many times in the course of this book.

Written references to minting, money, and coin will play an even larger part, for people are the focus here, not the coins as such. The volume and distribution of relevant texts depend on a whole other set of variables, tied up with processes relating to the production and preservation of written material. In this period only a small minority of the populace could read, and even fewer had the training and resources to write (a quite distinct skill from reading), the latter largely being members of the clergy. In some parts of early medieval Europe, laypeople would have used documentary materials (and even books) quite regularly. But because church archives were the only ones that survived the Middle Ages, these are the institutions about which most is known, and the perspective of monks and priests bulks large in knowledge of the period. One upshot of this is that many written accounts of coinage have a moral, religious slant to them. They deal in lessons: what should be, and what should not be, rather than what is. Their value is not diminished by this, but they do need to be read with care as a source for the social realities of the early Middle Ages.

60. There is little one can do except note the few cases of the finders and purveyors of illegal hoards being successfully prosecuted. From England alone in the period 2016–20, two such finds (from undisclosed locations in west Norfolk and Herefordshire) resulted in very public sentences for the offenders involved: “Police Officer Jailed for Gold Coins Sale Faces Longer Term,” BBC, 15 September 2017, https://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-england-norfolk-41283961; and Rebecc Mead, “The Curse of the Buried Treasure,” New Yorker, 9 November 2020, https://www.newyorker.com/magazine/2020/11/16/the-curse-of-the-buried-treasure. But many others are known only from rumour and from suspicious clusters of coins appearing on the market.

This book is divided into two parts. Part 1, consisting of chapters 2, 3, 4, and 5, looks at larger structural issues. These four chapters address, respectively, mining and sources of bullion, the making of coin, the use of coin and money beyond coin (i.e., commodities and bullion, as well as moneys of account). Part 2 is chronological in structure. Chapter 6 sets out the late Roman background. Chapter 7 then considers the gold-dominated post-Roman centuries, down to the seventh century. Chapter 8 looks at the first appearance and rise of the silver penny, in the era of the later Merovingians and Carolingians. Finally, chapter 9 turns to the tenth and eleventh centuries, considering in turn the institutional and organizational developments of coin production in the period, and changes in coin.
INDEX

Page numbers in italics refer to figures and tables.

Abbeville, France, 360
Abd al-Malik (Umayyad caliph) (685–705), Islamic dirhams under, 270
Abū Zikrī Judah, 43
Abu al-Faraj, money purse belonging to, 44 account, money of, 11, 141–43, 218
Acfred of Luzone, servile status of, 89
adaeratio (metallisation), 204
Adalbero (bishop of Laon) (d. 1030/31), 388, 389
Adalhard of Corbie (d. 826), transfer of lands arranged by, 119
Adelaide of Turin (d. 1091), 317
Ælfric Bata, 121; colloquy, 136–37
Ælfric of Eynsham (d. c. 1010), 60; parable of the talents, 68–69
Ælfwold, moneyer, 378
Æthelbald (king of the Mercians) (716–757), 278, 280
Æthelgifu, will of, 147
Æthelred II (king of the English) (978–1016): coinage of, 377–79; coin in hand of body, 91n82; reconiages, 62–63; silver penny of, 378; tribute payments, 94–95, 98.
   See also Agnus Dei coinage
Æthelstan (king of the English) (924–39), 149; law code of, 376n274; minted coins, 381; mint-places, 376
Æthelwold, St (bishop of Winchester) (d. 984): Leofsige and, 115; paying for lands, 111
Æthelwulf (king of the West Saxons) (839–58), silver penny minted under, 310
Agmundr, moneyer, 384, 385–86
Agnus Dei coinage, 63, 378, 378–79 agricultural production/produce, 141, 156, 159, 216, 307, 379. See also grain Aiguebelle, France, mint, 317–18, 322
Alahis (duke of Brescia), ousting King Cunincpert, 123–24
Alaric II (King of the Visigoths) (484–507), 58
al-ʿAzīz (Fatimid caliph) (975–96), 42, 42
Alba, kingdom of, 342
Albertini Tablets, 234
Albert of Aachen, 57
Alcuin of York (d. 804), 142–43
Aldhelm of Malmesbury (d. 709), 262, 263
Alexandria, Egypt, 42, 208
Alexius I (Byzantine/East Roman emperor) (1081–1118), 57
Alfred the Great (king of the West Saxons/ Anglo-Saxons) (871–99), 166, 297
almsgiving, 80–82, 137
Ambrose, St. (d. 397), 216; church of, 47; De officiis, 217; gold and wealth, 217; sarcophagus of, 88
Anastasius I (Byzantine/East Roman emperor) (491–518), larger-format bronze coins from Constantinople, 224
al-Andalus: coins of, 324–25; Muslim rule of, 228
Andrew of Fleury, 85–86
Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, 98, 162
Anjou, France, 363
annona, 208
Ansfried the Elder, 372
Antequera (Barbí), Spain, mint-place, 248
Anthemius (Roman emperor) (467–72), 197
Antioch, 187–88; coin finds, 195
antiqiores, 350; “money of St. Peter”, 83.
   See also papacy; Rome
Apion family, 201
Ardin, France, mint-place, 242
Aredius (abbot of Limoges), will of, 225–26
argentei, 225
aristocrats, 34, 72, 258, 278–79, 353, 376; Æthelgifu, 147; in charter of Saint-Vanne, 109; and communities, 304–5; dominance of, 127; economy and, 281, 395; entourage of, 246; failure in defending land, 92; families of, 272, 305; government payouts, 238; hoarding of, 307–8; as landlords, 102, 104, 133–34, 346; hoarding coins, 125–26; migration of, 292n137; and minting, 361, 365, 382; patrimonies of, 288–89; peasantry and, 336, 339; power and, 306; raising income, 254; Reichsaristikratie, 287; role of regional, 298, 301; in Roman economy, 209; secular, 300; splurging of, 223; trading system, 169; wealth and, 158; wool production, 128.

See also counts and counties

army tax, heribannus, 92

Artald (archbishop of Rheims) (946–61), 358

Athalaric (king of the Ostrogoths) (526–34), 38

Augustine, St. (d. 430), 217; anecdote in sermon, 201; De musica, 198; Fascius and, 203, 214; gold and wealth, 217; roles of man and God, 202

aurar/orar, 139

aurus, 139

autodeditio: ceremony of, 89; monastic familia and, 90

Auberre, France, mint-place, 356

Avars, 51

Avitus II (bishop of Clermont) (676–91), 272

balanced reciprocity, Sahlins on, 397

Banassac, France, mint-place, 236

barbaricum, pay to soldiers from, 145

Barcelona, Spain, 250–51, 360

barter, 143, 183

Bartlett, Robert, 340

base metal, 143n32. 188–89, 193, 199, 204, 219; coins, 2, 15, 145, 178, 182, 190, 194, 196, 198–99, 206, 208–9, 216, 223, 225, 226, 227–28, 230–31, 261, 324; currency, 223, 313; issues of coin, 226; silver as, 147, 239

Bavo, St., 77

Beaulieu-lès-Loches, France, mint-place, 357

Bede, priest and historian (d. 735), 105; Ecclesiastical History of the English People, 86; story from, 96

Ben Ezra Synagogue of Fustat (Old Cairo), 41–42. See also Geniza

Bertram (bishop of Le Mans) (d. 623), will of, 243

Bianchi, Giovanna, 32

bicharacta, coin, 193

Bir Umm Fawakhir, Egypt, 40–41

Bloch, Marc: feudal ages, 389; on medieval coinage, 4

Bolton, Jim, 3

Boniface, St. (archbishop of Mainz) (d. 754), gift exchange by network of, 83

“Book of Serfs”, monastery of Marmoutier, 89

Bornholm, Denmark, 164

Bourdieu, Pierre: observations on economy, 398; strategies for concealing strategies, 105

Britain: coin finds in, 194–95, 201; in Iron Age, 396; lack of coinage in post-Roman period, 3, 149–50, 223; lead mining, 28; low-value coinage of West, 225; military pay, 193, 210. See also Alba, kingdom of; England

British Home Office, 210

Brioude, France, mint-place, 356, 357

Brive-la-Gaillard, France, mint-place, 241–42

Brown, Peter: on buying power of gold, 200–201; use of early medieval money, 11

Brubaker, Leslie, 55–56

Brussels, Belgium, mint-place, 374

Buis, France, hoard, 270

bullion, 23–45, 160–66; Cairo Geniza and, 42–44; circulation of, 33–36; coinage and, 23–25, 34–35, 140–41, 144–45, 147–52; economy, 164; famine of later fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries, 393–94; imports of, 36–45; precious metal use in Scandinavia, 160–66; redistribution of, 30–31; silver, 4; supplies for coinage, 15–17; trade operation, 43–44. See also hackgold; hackmetal; hacksilver

Burgundians, 232

Bury St Edmunds, England, 77

Būṣīr, Egypt, 43

Byzantine (East Roman) Empire, 39–40, 257, 324; expenses of state, 394; fiscal minting, 55–57; gold, 40–41, 270, 270n30; production of miliareis, 60; silver pieces, 268; tax collectors, 204
INDEX [501]

Caesarea, Israel, coin hoard, 51
Cairo Geniza: Ben Ezra collection, 41–42; bullion market, 42–44; coins and weight, 150; money distribution, 44–45; trading networks of, 24
Caliphate: dirhams, 270; expenses of state, 394; fiscal minting in, 55–57; metallic resources, 41; minting model, 54; use of coin in, 150. See also al-Andalus; dirham(s); dinar(s); Fatimid Caliphate Canterbury, England, 83, 110, 262; mint-place, 309, 312, 376n274
capitale (head tax), 89
capitularies, 117n201, 149, 243, 266n18, 295, 297–98, 301
Carloman (Frankish emperor) (879–84), 117 Carolingian Empire, 57, 58, 60, 284–308; agency in coin circulation, 284–89; coin finds, 84; coin production, 318; minting and local elites, 297–308; minting and royal authority, 294–97; minting rights, 68; mint-places in, 299, 303; peasants and landlords, 99–100; peasants overcharging travellers, 117; polyptychs, 106, 290; recoinage, 61, 62; regional distinctions in coin circulation, 289–94; silver influx to west, 163. See also Francia; Gaul castles, 305, 323–24, 337
Cava dei Tirreni, Italy, 265
censuales, 89, 90, 98
centenaria (hundred-pound units of gold), 200
centenionalis (copper-alloy coin), 193
Centule V (viscount of Béarn) (1058–90), 361 ceramics. See pottery
cerarri, 97
Châlons-en-Champagne, France, 68
Changan, China, 178
Charibert II (Frankish king) (629–32), 236
charitable donations: almsgiving, 80–82, 137; Christian teaching, 187
Charlemagne (king and emperor of the Franks) (768–814), 147, 265, 284, 285, 288; arrangements of will, 296–97; coin issues, 355; coin reform of 792/3, 291, 300; decree on denarii, 58–59; exchange of coin, 59; inscription EX METALLO NOVO, 71, 71n101; minting, 316; mint places, 306; monogram coins of, 293n139; portrait denarius, 295, 296; recoinage, 62; silver coins, 292; standardizing currency, 294–95
Charles the Bald (West Frankish king) (843–77), 67, 297, 303, 305; coin issues, 355; coin reform, 294; coins in name of, 353; Edict of Pîtres (864), 301, 306; Gratia Dei rex coinage, 308, 352; hoards from territory of, 365; minting, 302, 305–6; mint-places, 306–7, 343; on missi and good coins, 136; recoinage, 61, 63, 64–65; silver denarius of, 64, 304; tribute by, 91–93, 98
Charles the Fat (Frankish emperor) (881–88): coin circulation, 285; coinage, 308; denarii, 302
Charles the Simple (West Frankish king) (898–923): coinage, 308; coin issues, 354, 355, 357; denarii, 302 charters, 33n48, 35, 105, 107, 118, 266; Bavarian, 114; Beneventan, 265; of Charles the Simple, 354; German, 368–71, 373; of Marmoutier, 73–74, 89, 90; from northern Spain, 156–58; proportion of, 334, 334n77; of Saint-Vanne, 109; Visigothic, 249; West Frankish, 358, 365; of William I, 356n176; witnesses of, 348, 350, 361n204, 383–84
Château-Landon, France, mint-place, 306
Château-Porcien, France, mint-place, 306
Château-Roussillon, France, hoard, 285
chequebook diplomacy, 270
ch’ien (standard coin), 173–75, 174
Childeric II (Frankish king) (755–96), 39; compact with Guntram (561–92), 240
Childeric I (Frankish king) (d. 481), broken coin as signal, 86
Childeric II (Frankish king) (d. 675), 272
China, 172–282; case of Tang and Song dynasties, 172–82; relationship of modern state to earlier empires, 173n189. See also Song dynasty (960–1127); Tang dynasty (618–907)
Chlothar II (Frankish king) (584–629), 243
Chlothar II (Frankish king) (584–629), taxation and, 243
chrematon, John Chrysostom using word, 188
Christiana Religio: coinage, 291, 294; Louis the Pious, 65, 66

For general queries, contact webmaster@press.princeton.edu
Christian of Stavelot, on ability of moneyers, 68
Christian rule, England, 257
Christian society, tithes to church, 95–98
Chrysostom, St. John (d. 407): on bronze and gold, 197; chrematon for coined money, 188; city of Antioch, 195; coined money, 199; gold and wealth, 217; preaching in Antioch, 187–88 churches: coins and, 276–78; colliberti and censuales, 98; eleventh-century carving at Ennezat, 329, 330; freedom from tax, 244–45; minting under the auspices of in German, 369–70; tithes and, 95–98; Visigothic laws and, 251.
See also clergy clarissimi, status, 212 clergy: church archives, 18–19; gifts involving, 82. See also churches cloth, 43, 99, 155n92, 158–59, 159–60, 179 clothing, 80, 85n47, 121, 137, 388
Cluny, France, abbey of, 104, 334, 359
coenixtio, 208, 211
Coenwulf (king of the Mercians) (796–821), 311 coined money: commerce and, 115–36; and credit, 106–11; and currency, 28–29; elites and, 123–30; fines and compensation, 111–15; gift-giving and, 75–85; hierarchical renders of, 91–106; how to make, 49–50; as injection of cash, 339; and land purchases, 337–38; major categories for use, 74–75; manumission and, 87–89; monetary obligations, 106–15; peasants and, 130–36; performative use, 85–91; size of currency, 50–53; Thibault and monks of Marmoutier, 73–74. See also commerce; gift-giving. See also currency coin finds: Anglo-Saxon contexts in England, 228; Antioch, Turkey, 195; archaeological, 30; Bavaria, 291; Carolingian, 292; changing hands, 325–26; from cities across later Roman Empire, 195–96; Dorestad, Netherlands, 289; El Tolmo de Minateda, Spain, 229, 261; England, 253–55, 291; Esdraela/Tel Jezeel, Israel, 196; Frankish kingdom, 290–91; Gaul, 225; gift-giving and, 83; gold, 41; gold and silver, 196; graves, 3; handling, 17–18; hoards, 3–4, 17, 18n60, 37–38, 374–76; Italian, 291–92; Merovingian silver, 282–84; Netherlands, 291; Niche of the Palliums, Vatican City, 1; Roman coins, 228; rural distribution of, 129; silver dirhams, 41; single, 374–76; Vieux-la-Romaine, France, 227–28; Yeavering, England, 256. See also hoards coins and coinage: bullion and, 23–25, 34–35, 140–41, 144–45, 147–52; characteristics of, 135; characteristics of early medieval, 11–17; circulation, 34–35; commercial use of, 396–98; early medieval money, 11–14; elites and, 123–30; in England c. 900–1100, 376–88; exchange of, 398; gold, in later Roman Empire, 189–94; how to make, 49–50; John Chrysostom preaching about, 187–88; local demand model, 54–55; low-value, scarcity of, 223–32; manufacture of, 15; minting, 13, 53–55; miracle tales of use, 132; mixed moneys, 152–56; models of minting and circulation, 395–96; money, morality and routinisation of, 326–33; peasants and, 130–36; precious metal use in Scandinavia, 162; primary and secondary uses, 394–95; regional distinctions in Carolingian circulation, 289–94; renovatio monetae, 61–67; revival in tenth- and eleventh-century Europe, 321; role of, 4–5; sources and approaches, 17–19; state demand model, 54; state expenditure model, 53–54; supply of, 14; transactionality of, 13; transfer of value, 87; uses of, 13–14, 137–38; virtues and vices, 329, 331. See also commerce; minting
Colle Gnifetti, Italy, 26
coliberti, 89, 90, 98
Colline Metalliferi, Italy, 26
Colline Metalliferi, Italy, 26, 28, 32 commerce, 10, 39, 44, 47, 75, 115–36, 164, 237; coined money and, 115–16, 204, 349, 367, 396–98; markets and prices, 116–23; Mediterranean, 3–4; minting and circulation, 395, 397; precious metal, 182; silver, 168, 178; transactions and, 349. See also coined money commercial revolution, 318; role of money and credit, 318–22 commodity exchange, 141, 144, 155–56; in northern Spain, 141, 156–60; in viking world, 141, 160–72 compensation: monetary obligations, 111–15; payments, 111, 114, 115
Confessio sancti Petri (St. Peter’s Basilica), Vatican City, 323
Conrad II (German king and emperor) (1024–39), 79
Constans II (Byzantine/East Roman emperor) (641–668), 39
Constantine I (Roman emperor) (306–37), 191; bronze follis, 193, 194; coin values, 19; gold solidus of, 191; public finance, 199
Constantine V (Byzantine/East Roman emperor) (717–41), silver coins of, 269
Constantinople (Istanbul), mint-place, 189, 191, 194, 224, 269 copper and copper alloy: coinage, 193, 226, 325; cutting coins into pieces, 228; in Gaul, 233–34; in later Roman empire, 193–94; mines in Song and Tang China, 175–76, 176; nummus of fifth and sixth centuries, 230; source of, 28. See also base metal Corbie (abbey of), France, 62
Council of Clichy (626/627), 245
Council of Paris (829), 120, 134, 135 counts and counties, 85, 113; Carolingian, 64, 265, 297–306, 316; Merovingian, 243, 249; Ottonian and Salian, 372; in the tenth and eleventh centuries, 318, 323, 354, 357–62. See also aristocrats; elites Coupland, Simon, 298n171; on coins with mint names, 296 credit, 4, 10, 115, 144, 173, 397; cards, 152; cash or, 318, 321; elasticity of, 108; landholding and medieval, 108–9; monetary obligations, 106–11
Cucincpert (Lombard king) (688–700), 123
Cuerdale, England, hoard, 51
curiales, 211, 212, 215 currency: coined, 28–29; Dark Age of, 2–4; impermeable borders for, 57–61; later Roman Empire, 198–202; moving from gold to silver, 15; process and scale of production, 48–49; size of early medieval, 50–53. See also coin finds; coined money; coins and coinage custos monetae, 360
CVRTISASONIEN, unidentified mint-place, 304, 304
Cyzikus, mint-place, 189
Dagobert I (Frankish king) (629–39), 104
Damascus, Syria, mint-place, 42
Damian, Peter (1007–72): money in writings of, 47–48; on simoniac sacraments, 327–28
Davidson, Ivor, 217
Davies, Wendy, 158
Davis, Jennifer, 295
debasement, 38, 196, 325, 354, 359–60
decuriones, 211
De duodecim abusivis saeculi, 80
De fisco Barcinonensi, 249–51
De musica (St. Augustine), 198
denarii (denarius), 15; Bishop Otbert and Henry IV, 368; Carolingian, 261, 266, 284–308; establishment of silver coinage, 315–16; find of Norman denarii in England, 60; from gold to silver, 268–72; home regions of new silver coinage, 266, 268; Hugh Capet as king (987–96), 354; inception of, 264; introduction in Italy, 291–93; minted, 14; minted at Auxerre, 356; of moneyer Otger, 374; origins of early medieval, 272–75; selection of early pennies, 277; silver, 2; silver in Italy, 263–64; silver rush (c. 660–750) in Frisia and Francia, 282–84; silver rush (c. 660–750) in England, 275–82; in southern England (c. 750–900), 308–15. See also Carolingian Empire; pennies; silver coins
Denmark, 341, 342
De officiis (St. Ambrose), 217
Derby, England, mint-place, 378
De rebus bellicis (anonymous), 199
de Roover, Raymond, 320
Desan, Christine, 10
descriptio, estate survey, 102–3
Dialogues (Gregory the Great), 260
Dialogus de scaccario (Richard FitzNeal), 66
dichoneutum, coin, 193
dies. See minting
digital money, 10
Dijon, France, 305
Dinant, Belgium, 359

dinar(s), 42–44; Abbasid gold, 52; Arabic-Byzantine gold, 270; Arabic, 84; of dirhams, 157; dirhams and, 93–94; gold, 44, 51; of Offa, 84; use in Geniza letters, 150–51

Diocletian (Roman emperor) (284–305): currency, 198; edict of maximum prices, 204 diplomas, 117, 295, 374; of Charles the Simple, 357; German, 343; of Otto I, 70; Ottonian and Salian, 69, 370; 117, 295; granting right to mint, 351, 369; royal, 29. See also charters dirham(s), 23, 31, 292; of al-‘Aziz, 42; circulation of, 33, 35; dinar of, 157; dinars and, 93–94; fragmentary, 151; import of, 36, 60, 323; institution of Islamic, 270; number and weight of coins, 150–51; routes of importation from Muslim world, 37; Samanid, 35, 36, 38, 164, 165; silver, 16, 36, 41, 42, 44, 51, 151, 156–57; single finds, 149; and slaves, 45; Umayyad, 269, 270; and Viking Age, 24, 160, 162–65, 167, 171

display economy, 164; in Scandinavia, 162

Dolley, Michael: coinage, 377; on eleventh-century Manx “mint”, 50

donations: almsgiving, 80–82, 137; coin for, 77; religious, 77–79
donatives/donativa, 56, 147, 201, 207–8, 215; post-Roman, 237–9, 248, 251

Dopsch, Alfons, 5

Dorestad (Wijk bij Duurstede), Netherlands, mint-place, 53, 60, 297, 301

Douai, France, 305

Dublin: pennies from (c. 950–1100), 341–42; mint-place, 342

Duby, Georges: concept of “feudal revolution”, 389; gift economy to profit economy, 320

Dunn, moneyer at Rochester, 310

Dunwich, England, mint-place, 382

Eadberht (king of the Northumbrians) (737–58): coinage of, 275, 280, 313; control of coin circulation, 58

Eadred (king of the English) (946–55), minting request in will of, 50–51, 53, 70–71

Eadric of Laxfield, 382

East Francia/Germany: coinage in tenth and eleventh centuries, 366–76; hoards, 374–76

East Roman Empire. See Byzantine Empire

East Tilbury, England, 263

Eberhard of Friuli (d. 867), will of, 288

Ebroin, Mayor of the Palace (d. 680/81), and silver coinage, 274

Ecgberht (archbishop of York) (732–66), 279, 280, 311

Edgar (king of the English) (959–75): coin reforms of, 62; law codes of, 377; silver penny of, 378

Edict of Pîtres (864), 61, 63–64, 65, 306; Charles the Bald and, 301, 306; silver denarius of Charles the Bald after, 64. See also Charles the Bald

Edward the Confessor (king of the English) (1042–66), 383, 384

Edward the Elder (king of the Anglo-Saxons) (899–924), 288
eels, and abbey of Ely, 118–19

Egica and Wittiza (Visigothic kings) (694–702/3), gold content of coins, 251

Einhard (d. 840), 78–79, 296

Eligius, St. (bishop of Noyon/Tournai) (d. 660), 39; Life of St. Eligius by St Audoin, 242, 244 elites: aristocrats, 287–89; Carolingian, 285–86; coined money and, 123–30; coin supply and, 125–26; gifts involving, 82; medieval coin minting, 394; minting and local Carolingian, 297–308; minting in West Francia, 363; peasants and, 126–30. See also aristocrats

El Tolmo de Minateda, Spain, coin finds at, 229, 261

Ely, Cambridgeshire, abbey of, 118–19

Enneza$t, France, carving from, 330

For general queries, contact webmaster@press.princeton.edu
Eorcenberht (king of Kent) (640–64), 86–87
Eorcengota, daughter of Eorcenberht of Kent, 86–87
Essen, Germany, 338
eulogiae, 105
Europe: mint-places in western (850–1100), 344, 345; monetizing economy, 322–26; regions for penny adoption in western European model, 341; spread of penny in western, 340–43
evil customs (malae consuetudines), 112
Évrard (abbot of Corbie) (1079–85), agreement with moneyers, 359
See also commerce; gift-giving; taxation; tribute
Exeter, England, mint-place, 384, 386
EX METALLO NOVO inscription, coins of Charlemagne with, 71, 71n101
eyrir (unit of weight), 139, 141
Eyvindr skáldaspillir (poet), 170–71
Faeroe Islands, 154
Faravel, France, 27, 28
Fascius, letter of St. Augustine concerning, 203, 214
Fatimid Egypt (969–1171), 41–42, 56; Caliphate, 44–45; coins, 325
Fécamp (c. 980–85), France, hoard, 364 fear of God (timor Dei), 329, 331 Feinwaagenlandschaft, 144, 149
feudalism, 319, 319n9; feudal economies, 127–28; feudal government, 319 feudal revolution: Duby's concept of, 389; scholarship on, 390–91
fideiussores (guarantors), 113
fines, 111–15
First Crusade, 57
fiscal minting, 55–57
Five Dynasties period (907–60), 177
Flavius Ammon, selling land for solidi, 201
Flavius Isidore, tax payment loss, 211
Flandern, historian, 358
follis (bronze), 193, 194
food, 61, 80, 82, 92, 119–20, 134, 137, 204–5, 237, 336 foreign coins: reminting of, 60–61; trading and, 59–60 forgery, 33n48, 136n905; legislation on, 248; moneyers and fear of, 361–62; prevention of, 61; protection against, 66, 377
Formulary of Marculf, 245
Forsa ring, 139–40, 140
Forum (Rome) hoard, 75–77, 76, 79
Fouracre, Paul, 133–34
Francia: gold coinage, 239–46; silver rush (c. 660–750), 282–84; Carolingian coinage, 284–308; coinage in the tenth and eleventh centuries, 352–76. See also Carolingian Empire; Gaul; Merovingian kingdom
Frisia: pennies, 272–73, 279; silver rush (c. 660–750), 282–84
Frothair (bishop of Toul) (813–47), markets and prices, 121
Fulk Nerra (count of Anjou) (987–1040), coin issue, 357
Galba (Roman emperor) (68–69), bronze as of, 229
galena, 25n8; silver refined from, 25
Gannon, Anna, 276
Gaul: copper-alloy coins, 233–34; finds from, 225–26; fiscal landscape of, 245–46; identifiable mint-places in Merovingian Gaul, 241; low-value coinage of West, 225–26; Merovingian, 54; Merovingian coinage, 239–46; minting, 236, 260; mint places, 234, 235; monetary landscape in, 235–36; taxation in Merovingian, 242–46. See also Francia Gebhard, St. (bishop of Constance) (979–95), gold coin for church foundation, 84
geldwirtschaft, 143
gender, 6, 74
general-purpose money, 7, 8, 9; Western, 11
general reciprocity, 153
Geoffrey (count of Angoulème) (1032–48), reestablishing mint, 360–61, 362
Gerald of Aurillac, St. (d. c. 909), 123; commercial conduct of, 120
Germany/East Francia, 366–76; gold coins, 145
Gesta Dagoberti, 31
gewicthsgeldwirtschaft, 149 gift economy, 164; idea of, 83

For general queries, contact webmaster@press.princeton.edu gift-giving, 3–5, 9, 74, 124; almsgiving, 80–82, 137; competitive side of, 82n37; devotional gifts, 84–85; ex stipe offerings, 87; Forum hoard, 75–77, 79; lower-status gifts, 82; money and, 75–85; ritual exchange and, 145, 147; scale of, 82–83; status of, 82. See also donations

Glaber, Ralph, 336

Godbroid (Danish king) (d. 810), 169

Gokstad ship burial, Norway, 166

gold: bureaucrats of later Roman Empire and, 215; Byzantine coinage, 40; currency of wealth and power, 200–202; gives way to silver denarii, 268–72; dominance of, 15; early Anglo-Saxon coinage, 257–58; El Tolmo de Minateda (Spain), 229, 261; emperor and state, 202–10; in excavations, 261; expenditures by state authorities, 205–6; managing, 201–2; in Merovingian Gaul, 239–46, 260; minting of, 155; post-Roman currency, 232–37; purses of, 43; solidus, 2, 125, 157; tracing the origins of, 25–29; Visigothic in Iberia, 246–53, 260; goldsmiths, 33n48, 39, 248, 383

Gokstad ship burial, Norway, 166

Gokstad ship burial, Norway, 166

Gotland: 167–72; dirhams found on, 160; society of, 167

Graeber, David: means of exchange, 142; money enforcing obligation or debt, 10; grain, 112, 157, 201, 205, 212; commodity, 149, 159, 178–79, 183, 287, 335; paying for, 243, 249, 251; prices for, 119, 338; storage of, 134, 321. See also wheat

Gregorio (Gregory of Tours), 260

Gregory the Great, St. (Pope) (590–604), 69, 244; Dialogues, 260

Gresham’s Law, 364

Grierson, Philip: on compact between Childebert II and Guntramn, 240; on early Anglo-Saxon coins, 253; on minting, 53; on pennies minted under Offa of Mercia, 52; on role of coins, 3–4

Grimoald III (prince of Benevento) (788–806), 265, 266

Gruszczyński, Jacek, 168

Guitbert of Nogent, 363

Guillerval, France, estate of Saint-Denis, 104

Gullbekk, Svein, 154

Guntramn (Frankish king) (571–92), compact with Childebert II (575–96), 240

hackgold, 148, 150, 315. See also bullion hackmetal, 153, 160, 162, 165n148. See also bullion hacksilver, 23, 145, 148, 150, 152, 160, 315. See also bullion

Hadrani, abbot (d. 710), 262, 263

Haldon, John, 8; on minting models, 55–56

Han Gan, artist (c. 706–83), 181

Harald the Hardrada (king of Norway) (1046–66), quality of silver coins, 153–54

Harz mountains, Germany, 26, 27, 33; early mining activity, 27n20; miners, 35; mining activity, 29; silver mines, 33–34

Hedeby, coin-based economy, 164, 165, 169

Heimskringla, 170

Hendy, Michael: on activity at mint of Barcelona, 250; distinction between public and private, 259; on erosion of government institutions, 56

Henry II (German king and emperor) (1002–24): coinage, 371; minting rights, 370

Henry IV (German king and emperor) (1054–1105): coinage, 369; silver denarius, 368

Henry V (German king and emperor) (1105–25), coinage, 369

Heraclea, mint-place, 189

Heracleius (Byzantine/East Roman emperor) (610–41), 270; silver pieces, 268, 269

heribannus, army tax, 92
INDEX [ 507 ]

Herlihy, David, on sales of land, 334
Hervé (bishop of Beauvais) (987–97), silver denarius, 354, 354
Hilton Hotel, Mainz, coin finds, 323
Historiae (Gregory of Tours), 116
Historical School, Sombart and, 320 hoards: Buis, 270; bullion or coin, 149; Chalon-Saint-Mars, France, 304; and coin finds, 3–4; of coins, 37–38; Crondall, England, 4; Cuerdale, England, 51, 53; of dirhams from Bornholm, Denmark, 164, 165; East Francia/Germany, 374–76; Fécamp and Le Puy, France, 364; Francia, Aquitaine and from Middle Kingdom, 286; from Gotland, 160, 167–69, 171; House of the Vestal Virgins, Rome, 196–97; Ilanz, Switzerland, 148; illegal, 18n60; Isle of Man, 152; Kaupang, Norway, 154, 166; Kimsweerd-Pingjum, Netherlands, 148; of Northumbrian pennies, 313–15, 314n238; of pennies, 279; Prittlewell, England, 255; Rendlesham, England, 256; Spillings, Gotland, 51, 53, 160–61, 161, 171; Staffordshire, England, 255, 257; Sutton Hoo ship, 254, 257; Traprain Law hoard, Scotland, 146; Vignacourt, France, 364; from Viking-Age Ireland, 152; Visigothic, 252; West Norfolk, England, 257; Woodham Walter, England, 276. See also coin finds Holy Dove: coinage, 378; iconography, 63. See also Agnus Dei coinage
Holy Sepulchre, Jerusalem, 295
Honorantie civitatis Papie (legal compilation), 347, 348, 351
Honorianus (Roman emperor) (395–423), 201; gold tremissis of, 191; law of, 213
Horndon, England, 381
House of the Vestal Virgins, Rome, hoard, 196–97
Hringwulf: lands held by, 387; moneymen under Edward the Confessor, 387
Hubert, St., 77, 117
Hugh Capet (king of France) (987–96), silver denarius, 354
Hui Tsung (Song emperor) (1100–26), 174
Humbert of Moyenmoutier: on payments and gifts, 77; on freedom, 326, 327 humiliores, 362. See also peasants
Iberian Peninsula: Gallaecia, 246, 247; minting, 260; Visigothic kingdom in, 246–53
Ibersheim, Germany, hoard, 285
ibn Bifam, Jirja, archive of documents, 44
ibn Fadlān, Aḥmad (d. c. 960), 33; on wives wearing neck-rings, 162
Ibn Ḥawqal, geographer, 31, 43
Ibn Hazm (d. 1064), 56; on monetary system of Taifa rulers, 93–94
ibn Nissim, Nahray, correspondence of, 43–44
ibn Ṣadaqa, ‘Ayyāsh, correspondence of, 43–44
ibn Yaʿqūb, Ibrāhim: fabric squares and, 159; observing Samanid dirhams, 38, Iceland, 159–60, 167, 170, 171. See also vadvmál iconography, 264, 276; lamb of God and the holy dove, 63, 378, 378; religious, 276n62, 378; Roman, 253; royal, 255
Ilanz, Switzerland, hoard, 148 imitative coins, 16
inequality, 6, 125, 127, 155; currencies of, 198–202
ingots, 145, 148, 152–53, 210n112; on Intan Wreck, 177–78; silver, 42, 177. See also bullion; hacksilver Innes, Alfred Mitchell, 141n3, 141–42
Intan Wreck, 177–78
Ireland, mixed and coin hoards in Viking Age, 152 iron coins, Chinese, 176–77, 180
Isle of Man, hoards, 152
Italica, Spain, mint-place, 248
Italy: bishops given right to mint coins, 351; Carolingian-period coinage, 291–3; coin finds, 18; coin use in the tenth and eleventh centuries, 345–52; credit in, 108; gold mining, 38; markets in, 121; minting in the tenth and eleventh centuries, 346–47, 350–52; moneymen, 347–50; post-Roman, 237–39; silver denarii, 263–64; tax payments (late Roman), 219–20; travellers to, 69
Jämtland, Sweden, silver economy, 166–67
Jeremiah (archbishop of Sens) (d. 828), 121
Jerome, St. (d. 420), on Vigilantius, 201
jewellery, 23, 148, 152n77, 223
jiaozi, printing of, 177
John Gualbert, St. (d. 1073), on payments and gifts, 77
John of Gorze, St. (d. 974), praise for managing minting, 69
Jonas (bishop of Orléans) (d. 843), 120, 134; “willing compact of seller and buyer”, 12
Joseph and Putiphar, Old Testament, 332, 332–33
Justina (d. c. 388), mother of Valentinian II, 216–17
Justinian (Byzantine/East Roman emperor) (527–565): coins of, 58; financing army, 207
Justinian Code, 218
Kaiyuan Tongbao, Chinese coin, 174
Kaufang, Norway, 169; archaeological finds from, 154; crucible melt from, 23, 24, 25; hoard, 166
Kelly, Christopher, 212
Kinswerd-Pingium, Netherlands, hoard, 148
kings, taxation by, 91–94
Kings’ Sagas, 153–54
Koenwald (bishop of Worcester) (d. 958/9), silver offering, 79–80
Kuchenbuch, Ludolf, 124; on measuring value, 142
Kyiv, Ukraine, 340

labour services, 47–48, 78, 96, 99, 102–3, 110, 127–28, 213, 249, 335, 337–38; commodities and, 100; labourers, 9, 214; migratory season and, 190; mining, 30; moneyers, 347, 365; peasants, 131, 388, 390; urban, 174; wages for, 34, 102, 106, 134, 231
Lafaurie, Jean, 283
Lamb of God, iconography, 63. See also Agnus Dei land(s), 4; of the church, 389; credit and, 106–11; elites and, 13, 188, 218–19, 274, 386; grants of, 309, 310n225; heirs of, 89; Islamic, 161, 325; market for, 120, 141, 158, 318, 334, 337, 349, 391; military, 18; money and, 333–39; negotiating, 115, 119, 349; owners of, 29–30, 56, 72, 94, 106, 135, 152, 157, 168, 211–15; peasants on, 64, 133–34, 244, 336; prices for, 119–20, 338, 361; productivity of, 126–27, 288; public, 32, 316, 351; purchase of, 44, 50, 71, 86, 201, 237, 248, 284, 394; tax on, 66, 92, 203, 204n82, 205, 237–38, 245, 249, 363 landlords: gifts to, 82; rents to, 97–100, 102, 104–5, 118, 260, 339 Landulf (abbot of S. Ambrogio), 349
Langres, France, bishop of, 305
La Roda de Andalucia, Spain, mint-place, 248 Latin Anthology, poem in, 238 laws, 63; of Æthelberht, 276n59; of Alfred the Great, 113, 143; English, 255; of Ine, 255; of minting, 192–93; of nature, 197; tax, 2244; in Theodosian Code, 215; Visigothic, 251. See also capitularies lead: isotopic variants of, 25–26; mines, 25; source of, 28
Le Goff, Jacques, 7–8
Leofsfige, Cambridgeshire landowner, 115
Leo III (Byzantine/East Roman emperor) (717–41), silver coins, 268, 269
Leo IX (Pope) (1049–54), 317; on simoniacal appointments, 327
Leovigild (Visigothic king) (568–86), coinage of, 247–48, 249
Le Puy (c. 996–1002), France, hoard, 364
Le Talou, France, mint-place, 306
Leudegar (archbishop of Vienne) (1030–70), 317
Leyser, Conrad, 336
Libellus Æthelwoldi, 119
Liber pontificalis, 24, 148
Liège, Belgium, mint-place, 64, 368
Life of St. Eligius. See Eligius, St.
Limonta, Italy, 102
Lincoln, England, mint-place, 385
liquid silver, 161
Lisdorf, Germany, mint-place, 357
Little, Lester, 320
loans and compensation, 115. See also credit local demand model, minting, 54–55
Lodi, Italy, bishop of, distributing money to deserving poor, 71
London, mint-place, 53, 194, 309
longue durée; 2; coin-use over 2; scale variable, 129
López, Robert: on churches, 337; on Commercial Revolution, 319
Lothar (West Frankish king) (954–86), coins in name of, 353
Lothar I (Frankish emperor) (d. 855), 147
Louis the Child (East Frankish king) (899–911), coin production, 357
Louis the German (East Frankish king) (843–876), 95, 108; coin circulation under, 284–85
Louis the Pious (Frankish emperor) (814–40), 284, 286, 297; coins of, 48, 49, 65, 66, 284, 285, 286, 288, 293n139; death of, 291, 300; minting, 301, 316; mint places, 306; recoinage, 62; silver denarius of, 66; standardisation of currency, 294
Louis IV (West Frankish king) (936–54), 358; coin issues, 354
Louis V (West Frankish king) (986–87), coins in name of, 353
Loveluck, Chris, 170
love of money, carving showing, 329, 330
Lucca, Italy, 110, 292; credit records of bishop, 110; distribution of episcopal properties owing rent, 101; episcopal, lands, tenants and dues, 100
luminarii, 97
Lupus of Ferrières (d. 862): coin circulation, 286; silver money of Italy, 57–58
Lydus, John, 203; boasting about fees, 212–13; on money and tax, 56
Maastricht, Netherlands, 368
Macarius of Egypt, St. (d. 391), Adam’s transgression in Garden of Eden, 198 Maffliers, France, hoard, 364
magister monetariorum, 360
Magnus Maximus (Roman emperor) (383–88), silver siliqua of, 192
Mainz, Germany, 374; coin finds from, 323, 375; use of Samanid dirhams in, 38
maiorina (copper-alloy coin), 193
malae consuetudines (evil customs), 112 manecipia tributaria (servile tenants), 260 mancus (gold denomination), 50, 84, 122, 147. See also dinar mansus, 92
manumission, coin use and, 87–89
Marbach, Germany, 370
Marcellinus and Peter, Sts., 78
Marcian (Roman emperor) (450–57), bronze nummus, 194
Marinus II (Pope) (942–46), 75, 76
mark, weight and measure of value, 30, 170 markets: Antioch, 187–88; coin use in, 65, 68, 177, 179, 196, 281, 289–90, 312, 318, 396; commerce, 116–23; circulation of goods, 346; demand for minting, 69, 70; elites and, 123–28; Geniza bullion, 44; gold in, 198, 205; for land, 120, 141, 158, 318, 334, 337, 349, 391; lords benefiting from, 117–18; of lower-value goods, 169; as mindset, 116–17; mint and, 348, 357, 358, 369, 379, 372, 374; money, lands, and, 333–39; open, 119, 123, 205, 308; peasants and, 100, 102, 116, 130–38; prices and, 119–22; rural, 337, 352; trading, 9, 14, 59; twin roles of, 117; urban, 335, 337, 346, 352, 386. See also commerce
Marmoutier, France: family of monastery of, 89; monks of, and Thibault, 73–74; owners of slaves, 89
Marseille, France, 111
Marx, Karl, 7
Masona (bishop of Mérida) (d. c. 600/610), 369
Matzke, Michael, 35
Maurice (Byzantine/East Roman emperor) (582–602), 39
Mauss, Marcel: on gift-giving, 4; sociology of money, 7
Mediterranean, monetary economy, 231
Mell, Julie, 320
Melle, France, 26, 27, 33; Alpine glaciers as evidence for mining, 26n19; coins of Louis the Pious, 48, 49; mining, 28; mint-place, 49, 65, 297, 301; silver extraction at, 274–75, 307
merchants, 31, 42–44, 58–60, 94, 151, 152, 281, 288, 292, 348–49, 373; and Cairo Geniza, 16, 41; and commercial revolution, 318–21; in Germany, 35, 111; in Gregory of Tours, 116, 223, 260; in Ifriqiya, 43; Jewish, 41; professional, 166, 395; Roman economy, 209; seagoing, 274; Tang dynasty, 178–80; Venetian, 120
Méron, France, priory, 112
Merovingian coinage: gold, in Gaul, 239–46; origins of, 272, 274; silver, 282–84; Sutton Hoo ship-burial, 3–4. See also Francia; Gaul Merovingian kingdom, 58, 232; coin use, 126, 129; commodity exchange, 144; gold tremisses, 145n30; manumission by coin, 87; silver coinage, 282–84; Theodebert I, 234. See also Francia; Gaul metalworking, 32, 48–50, 155, 348; gold and silver obtained from, 68; nonferrous, 365; precious, 256, 282
Metcalf, Michael: on minting, 53; on Offa of Mercia, 52
Milan, Italy, 216–17, 291, 334; mint-place, 347, 348, 350 miliar ensis (silver coin), 192 military: donativa, 207–8; minting and salary to, 236; pay and late Roman minting, 236; payment in base metal, 208; payments in kind for supplies, 204–5; soldiers, 102; soldiers spending adaeratio-commuted cash, 214 mines and mining, 23–36; balancing act, 30; gold, 38, 40, 40n85; lead, 25; obstacles of, 29–32; silver, 14, 15, 25–26, 33, 36, 37, 41, 178, 274
minting, 18; coins, 13; demand for, 69; denarii in Italy, 291–93; English coinage, 255–58; fiscal, 55–57; gold coins and, 260; as insult to enemy, 48; later Roman Empire, 233; military pay, 236; models of, 53–55; models of circulation and, 395–96; numbers of coins and dies, 51–52; organization, 53; private demand, 67–71; process in cathedral, 47–48; reminting foreign coin, 60–61; role of elites, 15; royal authority and, 294–97; state expenditure model, 53–54; stimulation of, 28; supplying coins, 69–71
mints/mint-places, 34; in the Carolingian Empire, 265, 299, 303; in East Francia/Germany, 366–76; in England, 379–88, 380; in Gaul, 234, 235; identifiable, in Merovingian Gaul, 240, 241; in later Roman Empire, 189–92, 190; new and old (c. 850–1100), 343–44; in Visigothic Spain, 247, 248; in western Europe (850–1100), 344, 345
Misrata, Libya, coin hoard, 190
Missorium of Theodosius, 206, 207
Mitry, France, peasants of, 103 mixed moneys, social dynamics of, 152–56 modalities of exchange, 9 monasteries, 44, 64, 79, 71, 73, 99, 109, 119, 130, 349, 359, 369–70, 372, 381; aristocrats and, 134, 158–59, 394, 346; cathedrals and, 300; German, 79; lands and, 249; Loire, 102; Marmoutier, 89; St. Catherine, 96; Stabilis, 85. See also churches Monetarlanschaft, 144, 149 monetary economies, coin handling in, 16–17 monetary osmosis, 4; mechanisms of, 333–39
monetising economy, Europe, 322–26 money: concerns about proper place of, 78; “Dark Age” of, 4–7; early minting, 394; forming commercial revolution, 318–22; making a statement with, 85–91; markets and lands, 333–39; meanings of, 7–10; means of exchange and, 141–44, 182–83; measuring value of, 141–43; mechanisms of monetisation, 333–39; medieval, 398–99; minting and circulation models, 395–96; new and old mints (c. 850–1100), 343–44; power and problems of money in the later Roman Empire, 194–97; in the rural economy, 118–19; social dynamics of mixed moneys, 152–56; social weight and obligations, 114; and status and ritual, 85–91. See also coined money; early medieval money money changers, 44, 58, 60, 219; compulsory purchase from, 205; function of, 382n294; moneyers and, 34, 47; in New Testament, 62; nummularii as metaphor, 69. See also moneyers monetary obligations: credit, 106–11; fines and compensation, 111–15. See also credit Mont Lozère, France, 26, 27, 28; smelting metal, 30
Moore, R. I., 389
munuscula, 82
Murray, Alexander, 245
Narbonne, France, mint-place, 65
Naturalwirtschaft, 143, 156
Nazarius, moneymaker, 349
Netherlands, 292; coin finds, 294; find records in, 291; gold coins, 145
New Testament, 62
Niche of the Palliums, St. Peter’s Basilica (Vatican City), coins from, 1
Nicomedia, mint-place, 189, 191
Noirmoutier, France: commercial coin use, 131; miraculous spewing of, 132; non-elites at, 133; shrine of St. Philibert, 130
nominal denominator, 142
Norman coinage, 67n85
Norman Conquest, 339, 383
northern Spain, commodity exchange in, 141, 156–60
Northumbria, kingdom of, 313–15; coinage of, 155, 309
Norwich, England, mint-place, 387
Notker the Stammerer (d. 912): on coin circulation, 284–85; on market abuse, 134 nummularii, 262. See also moneyers nummus: bronze, 193–94, 194; copper-alloy, of fifth and sixth centuries, 230; monetary economy, 231. See also base metal; copper and copper alloy obol(s), 49, 85, 283, 284, 292
Odilo (monk of Soissons), record of offerings, 81, 81n27
Odo, abbot of Cluny (d. 942): and almogiving, 81; on commercial conduct of lord, 120
Offa of Mercia (757–96): coinage of, 309, 311; control over coin circulation, 58; dinar, 84, 84; offering of mancuses, 84–85; size of currency, 52
Olaf Haraldsson (king of Norway) (1015–28), 154
Old Norse, 170
Old Testament, 330; Abram and Sarai, 332, 332; Joseph and Putiphar, 332, 332–33
Olympiodorus of Thebes, 200
Ostrogoths, 232; and Italy, 237–39
Oswald (king of the Northumbrians) (634–42), 147
Oswulf, moneyer, 378
Otbert (bishop of Liège) (1091–1119): coinages of, 371; silver denarius, 368
Otger, moneyer, 373, 374
Otto (Margrave of Savoy) (d. 1057/60), 317
“Otto-Adelheid Pfennige”, 34
Otto I (German king and emperor) (936–73), original diploma granting right to market and mint-place, 70
Otto III (German king and emperor) (983–1002), coinage of, 370–71
Ottonian period (936–1024), minting in, 367, 368, 372, 374–76 ounces, 216, 348
pallia (papal favour), 1
papacy: coinage of, 83, 350; gifts to, 75; “reform” party, 47–48, 327; silver and gold, 24
paper money, in China, 176
Paris, 132, 223, 364. See also council of Paris
Paston family, and precious-metal coin, 215
Paston, John (III), 215
Pataria, 349
Paul the Deacon, story of Alahis, 123–24
pauperes, 137
Pavia, Italy, mint-place, 76, 347, 348, 350
Peace of God movement, 389
Penda (king of the Mercians) (d. 655), 278 pennies: advent of, 15; from Dublin, 341–42, 342; early (c. 660–750) in Merovingian kingdom, 129–30; early history of, 265; inception of, 264; European silver, 174, 174; question of early medieval origins of, 272–75; regions of adoption, on western European model, 341; from Rendlesham, England, 263; selection of early, 277; spread of, 267, 340–43. See also denarii

Percarit (Lombard king) (672–88), 269

Peter's Pence, Forum hoard as example of, 75

Peter the moneyer, Italy, 349

Philibert, St., shrine of, 130

Philip I (king of France) (1060–1108), hoards from territory of, 365

Piacenza, Italy, bishop of, 96

Pierre, Henri, 39

Pilet-Lemière, Jacqueline, 283

pilgrims and pilgrimage, 1, 78, 88, 106, 107, 81, 110, 120, 328

Pippin I (king of Aquitaine) (817–38), payment demands, 102–3

Pippin III (Frankish king) (751–68), 294, 301; accession in 751, 284, 285

Pirenne, Henri: on Carolingian monetary regime, 3; emergence of “new notion of wealth”, 319; Pirenne thesis, 39

Piron, Sylvain, 328

Pius XI (Pope) (d. 1939), 1

Polanyi, Karl, 155

polyptychs, 118, 290; of Lucca, 101; of Prüm, 32; of Rheims, 105–6; of Saint-Germain, 100, 304; of Wissembourg, 99

Postan, Michael, 8, 321

pottery, 129, 287

pound, 4, 30, 64; Carolingian, 303; of gold, 200, 216; of precious metal, 142; Roman, 303, 191, 206; of silver, 63, 141, 201, 208; of wax, 90

Praetorian Prefecture, 237

Pragmatica sanctio, 58

precaria, 98; Carolingian grants of, 127

Pršbram, Czech Republic, 27, 28

private demand, minting and, 67–71

Procopius (d. after 565), 221; on coins minted by Theodebert I, 221–22; on money and tax, 56

productive sites, 263, 290

Prüm, Germany: minting rights, 68; polyptych, 31, 100, 118; power dynamic of lands, 103

public mints, 192; in later Roman Empire, 215–16

public tax (census publicus), 242

public use (usus publicus), solidi in demand for, 205

Qāsim, merchant, 44

Qāsim b. Khālid (941–944), minting dirhams, 157

Quentovic (La Calotterie), France, mintplace, 274, 296, 297, 306

Ramsbeck, Germany, 27, 28

Raoul (West Frankish king) (923–36), 303–4

Reccared (Visigothic king) (586–601), taxation and churches, 249 recoinage. See renovatio monetae “reform” papacy, 47; on payments and gifts, 77. See also papacy

Reichenau, Germany, abbey of, document dealing with liability, 113

Reichs aristokratie, 287

relics, 1, 78, 86, 104, 105, 303, 311. See also shrines

Remi (Remigius), St., feast day of, 105

reminting, 59; of foreign coin, 60–61. See also renovatio monetae

Rendlesham, England: archaeological background, 263; coin finds at, 256

rents, 2, 82, 93, 93, 93, 100, 116, 254, 395; from ecclesiastical lands, 350; elites and, 237; labour and 213–14; monetary, 97–100, 101, 102–6, 118, 338–39; richer peasants and, 133; wives of unfree tenants paying, 226

Rheims, France, 105, 338, 358
Rhineland, Germany, 34, 35, 302, 307, 319, 369
Rhine, river, 291, 366–67, 370, 396
Ribe, Denmark, coin-based economy, 164
Richard II (duke of the Normans) (996–1026), monetary gift, 96
Richer of Rheims, 337
Rigold, Stuart, 273
ritual, money and, 85–91
Robert II (king of France) (996–1031), Adalbero writing to, 388
Rochester, England, mint-place, 310, 310
Roman Empire, 5, 13, 14, 54, 188; coin and bullion in, 144–45, 147–52; currencies of inequality in, 198–202; East, 39; gold coinage in, 189–94, 202–10; gold and silver in, 147; manufacture and circulation of gold, 209–10; mass-market currency of, 223; minting coin in, 233; mint-places in, 189–92, 190; monetary system of, 188–89; money as cause and source of power and problems in, 194–97; Roman model of minting, 394; salaries for bureaucrats, 206–8; state and private demands, 210–16; taxes in, 203–4, 218–20
Rorschach, Switzerland, minting at, 69, 70, 370
Rouen, France, mint-place, 306n210 royal authority, minting and, 294–97
Rozo family, moneyers, 348
rural economy, money in, 118–19. See also peasants Russia, 163
sacred largesses (sacrae largitiones), 192, 206, 237
sagas: contemporary, 167; Kings’ Sagas, 153–54; Svarfdæla, 168
Sahlins, Marshall: on balanced reciprocity, 397; on general reciprocity, 153
Saint-Denis, France, abbey of, 103–4
St. Gall, Switzerland, abbey of (St. Gallen), 68n90, 69, 70, 79–80, 113, 370, 373
Saintes, France, mint-place, 360, 362
Saint-Germain, France, abbey of, 118
Saint-Mihiel, France, 373
St. Peter’s Basilica, Vatican City, 1–2
Saint-Vanne, France, abbey of: charter with aristocrat Wido, 109; credit money to local landowners, 106–7, 108–9
Salian period (1024–1125), minting in, 367, 372, 374–76
Salme, Estonia, mass burial, 170
Salvian, chastising rich of Gaul, 95n99, 211, 213
Samanids, 164, 165
San Martín de Asán, Spain, abbey of, 249
Scandinavia, 16, 38, 50, 149, 155, 160–72, 183, 396; adoption of penny, 340; bullion economy, 141; coins found beneath churches, 81; end of bullion circulation, 322–23; metal production and distribution, 50; recoinages, 67; silver bullion, 130; solidi in, 145; use of special metals in, 162–63
secat: fela sceatta, 332n70; term applied to coins, 276n59. See also pennies Schiesser, Philippe, 284
seigneurial economies, rents, 105–6
Seltz, France, 370
senatorial aristocracy (Roman), 200, 203; property of, 212, 219–20
Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, Old English version of legend of, 59
Seville, Spain, 248; bronze coin from, 224
Shakespeare, William, 7 shilling/scilling, 125, 328; gold, 254, 256, 256n191 shipwrecks: dinars lost in Caesarea harbour, 51; Intan Wreck, 177–78 shrines, 78, 81, 130, 300. See also relics Sidonius Apollinaris (d.489), 212
Sigismund (king of the Burgundians) (516–24), 58, 233
Sigurdsson, Harald (king of Norway) (1046–66), control over coin circulation, 58
Silhtric Silkbeard (king of Dublin) (989/95–1036), silver penny, 342 siliqua (silver denomination), 162–63, 192–93, 201, 206, 249 silver: annual output, 30n32; circulation of bullion, 33–36; distribution, 32–33; “dry”, 25n8; mines of, 14, 15; mixed moneys, 154–55; purses of, 43–44; routes for trade in during late tenth and eleventh centuries, 41; rush (c. 660–750) in England, Frisia and Francia, 275–84; sites of significant extraction, 27, 27–28; solidus, 157; source of, 28; sources in Muslim world, 36n60; tracing the origins of, 25–29; in viking world, 171. See also bullion; denarius; dirham; hacksilver; pennies; siliqua silver coins: antiquiores, 83; attraction of, 13; denarius, 2; dirhams, 151, 156–57; home regions of new, 266, 268; later Roman empire, 192–94. See also denarii (denarius); dirham; penny; siliqua

“silver rush” (c. 660–750), 275–84

Simmel, Georg: effect of money on society, 87; on freedom of using money, 6; money bringing freedom and equality, 13; sociology of money, 7

Simon Magus, 47

simony, 326; opposition to, 326–27

Sindbæk, Søren, 45

Sisebut (Visigothic king) (612–21), 248

Skre, Dagfinn, 171

slaves and slavery, 33, 45, 167, 214, 264; Abram being sold into, 332; category of, 255; commodities and, 163; forgery and, 248; freedom and, 91; in Ireland, 142; medieval, 87–89; payments by, 91, 131, 135

small change, 8n47, 223, 227–30, 325, 392

smelting, 30, 32; mining process, 30–32. See also mines and mining

Smith, Paul Jakov, 181

Snorri Sturluson (1179–1241), Heimskringla, 170

Soissons, France, 81, 300

Solignac, France, 242

solidus, 92; Byzantine, 265–66; gold, 2, 147, 157, 190–93, 191, 198–202, 218, 222, 230; labour and, 216; of precious metal, 142; Roman, 2, 58, 232, 254; salaries, 206, 213; silver, 157; tax rates, 213; unit of account, 110–11, 198–202, 227, 347. See also gold

Sombart, Werner, 320

Song dynasty (960–1127), 141; case study of, 172–82; coins, 174, 180; copper mining, 175–76, 176

Spain, 54; commodity exchange in northern, 141, 156–60; El Tolmo de Minateda, 229, 261; mines for silver currency, 26, 27; Visigothic mint-places, 247

special-purpose money, 7, 155

Spillings, Gotland, hoard, 160, 161

spirit of capitalism, 320

Spufford, Peter, 28

Stafford, England, mint-place, 378

Staffordshire, England, hoard, 255, 257

state demand model, minting and, 54

state expenditure model, minting and, 53–54

state-sponsored moneys, 12 status, 6, 43, 74, 76, 120, 310–11, 328; churches and, 271; coins and, 165, 257, 265, 355; of denarius, 136; ecclesiastical renders, 97, 300; elites and, 147, 212, 390; exchange, 84; gifts involving, 79, 81–82; gold and, 183, 189, 197, 206, 218, 226, 246; land and, 109, 119, 334, 335; mints and, 192; and ritual, 95–91; money as currency of, 114; moneyers, 316, 347, 352, 360, 362, 372; of peasants, 104–5; smiths and, 255; society and, 132–33; tax registers and, 245; urban, 379, 380n285; wealth and, 333. See also gift-giving stipendium (Roman military pay), 208

Strasbourg, France, 360

structural monetization, 142

Sturmer, England, hoard, 201

Sudetes, Czech Republic, 27, 28

Suger (abbot of Saint-Denis), (d. 1151), De administratione, 104

Sulpicius Severus (d. c. 425), casting aside “gold and silver”, 217

Sulzburg, Germany, 27, 28

Sutton Hoo (England) ship-burial, gold and silver of, 3–4

Sveafelds saga, 168

Symeon of Trier, St. (d. 1035), 96

Symmachus, Quintus Aurelius (d. 402), 200; purchase from money changers, 205

Tabarrini, Lorenzo, 389

Tablettes Albertini, 226n16; dowry in, 226
INDEX

Tattershall Thorpe, England, burial of smith, 255

Taüll, Spain, apse painting, 80

taxation, 203n79; coinage and, 44, 395; in De fisco Barcinonensi, 249–51; demand for, 54, 381; ecclesiastical immunity from, 242, 245, 283; elite and state interests, 259–60; gold and, 196, 202, 205, 210, 213, 218, 222; gold and, in Barbarian kingdoms, 232–37; gold coinage and, 243; as institution, 98; king and agents of, 91–94; in later Roman Empire, 203–4, 218–20; Merovingian, 242–46; paying, 177–78, 252; in post-Roman Italy, 237–39; principal unit of, 244; Roman, 210, 211; salt and, 177; silver and, 193; under Tang and Song dynasties, 179, 181; unfair, 93–94, 95n99; and Visigothic monetary system, 249–53

temple-type coins, 295–97

tenants and tenancies: Carolingian peasants and landlords, 99–100; distribution of properties owing monetary rent, 101; free mansi, 92; landlords and, 100, 102–3; servile (mancipia tributaria), 260 textiles, 42; under Tang dynasty, 178–79, 181. See also cloth; clothing

Theodahad (Ostrogothic king) (534–36), larger-format bronze coins from Rome, 224

Theodebert I (Frankish king) (533–547/48): coins as blend of old and new, 222; gold solidus of, 222; minting places, 234, 235; solidi and tremisses of, 221–22

Theoderic (Ostrogothic king) (493–526), 36; letters referring to donativa, 238; minting places, 234

Theodore, St. (archbishop of Canterbury) (668–90), 262, 263

Theodosian Code, 215, 218

Theodosius II (Roman emperor) (402–50), law of, 213

Theodred (bishop of London) (d. 951x953), 76

Thessalonika, Greece, mint-place, 189

Thibault, French landowner, 112; monks of Marmoutier and, 73–74

Thietmar of Merseburg, 27

Prándr, leading man in Faeroes, 154

Thrace, 189

Tien Shan (mountain range), silver mines, 36

tithes, church and, 95–98, 337–38. See also churches

Tomares, Spain, coin hoard, 190

Toulouse, France, 234

transactional orders, 9

trapezitae, 360, 361. See also moneymakers

Traprain Law, Scotland, hoard, 146

tremissis, 2, 3; of Avitus II, 272; of Charibert II, 259; gold, 123, 125, 191, 230, 232, 233, 259–61, 264, 266, 283, 396; in later Roman Empire, 190; of Leovigild, 248; manufacture of, 71; Merovingian, 48n4, 145n30, 239, 244, 253; minted, 14, 50; silver, 275; as standard of measure, 150; of Theodebert I, 221; Visigothic-era, 156, 248, 249, 251–53. See also solidus tribute, 14, 40, 54, 116; under Æthelred II, 94–95; Bede’s view of, 96; in Byzantine Empire, 268; under Charles the Bald, 91–92; in England, 64, 66, 126, 137, 381, 395; in Roman period, 145, 206; Stabilis owing, 85; Prándr gathering, 154; to vikings, 57, 94, 107n153, 109–10, 136, 155, 307, 313; in Visigothic Spain, 247, 249

Trier, Germany, mint-place, 192

Tys, Dries, 170

Ukraine, 163

Umayyad Caliphate, 270

Unibos (poem), 67, 122, 328–29

usury, 329, 330. See also credit

Valens (Roman emperor) (364–78), public mints, 215

Valentinian I (Roman emperor) (364–75): law of, 209–10; minting system, 219; public mints, 215–16

Valentinian II (Roman emperor) (375–392), 205; Justina, mother of, 216–17

For general queries, contact webmaster@press.princeton.edu
Valentinian III (Roman emperor) (425–55), 193, 198
Vandal Africa, 238, 239; coinage of, 233–34
vaðmál, 159, 159–60. See also cloth
Venantius Fortunatus, 114
Vendôme, France, mint-place, 362
Venice, Italy, mint-place, 60, 266, 306n210, 346, 351
Verboven, Koenraad, 142
Verdun, France, 373, 375
Verona, Italy, mint-place, 346, 350
Vieux-la-Romaine, France, 227
Vigilantius, 201; St. Jerome on, 201
Vignacourt, France, hoard, 364 vikings and the Viking Age: in Baltic, 4; circulation of goods, 45; commodity exchange in, 141, 160–72; dirham imports, 38; and dirhams, 36; meeting sites in, 170; oath ring, 139; role of money in, 164; silver use in, 160–62; weighing precious metal in, 166. See also Scandinavia Viking “of Awliscombe”, moneyer, 384; Agmundr and, 385–86; lands of, 386
Villanova, Italy, abbot of, land acquisition by, 157
Visigoths, 232, 234. See also Spain
Vitas patrum Emeritensium, 260
Vosges, France, 27, 28
Wælhrafn, moneyer, 385
wages, 34, 131, 143, 190
Ward-Perkins, Bryan: on collapse of economic sophistication, 3; on world without small change, 223 warfare, 170
Warring States period (c. 475–221 BC), 175
Weber, Max: money as technology of power, 8; sociology of money, 7
Werner, Joachim, 144
West Francia. See Carolingian Empire; Francia; Gaul
West Norfolk, England, hoard, 257
wheat, 44, 97, 142, 200, 204, 338n103, 362; barter of, 143; bread, 2, 264. See also grain Wickham, Chris: on elite dominance, 127; models of medieval economic structures, 127, 128–29; on outer Europe, 16; survey of early medieval economy, 3
Widukind of Corvey, 27
Wiesloch, Germany, 26, 27, 28; mining process at, 31
Wihtred (king of Kent) (690–725), and early English pennies, 273
William I (duke of Aquitaine) (d. 918): coin issue, 356; silver denarius of, 357
William II (duke of Aquitaine) (918–26), coin issue, 356
Williams, Gareth, 150
William the Conqueror (duke of Normandy and king of the English) (1035–87), 383
William of Malmesbury, 86n48
Wissembourg, France, polyptych from, 99
Wood, Ian, 274
Woodham Walter, England, hoard, 276
Worms, Germany, 369, 374
Wulfred (archbishop of Canterbury) (805–32), 335
Wulfstan (archbishop of York) (d. 1023): on coinage, 377; recoinage, 61
Wulfstan, St. (bishop of Worcester) (1062–95), 86n48
xenia (gifts) 82, 105
Yeavering, England, excavations at, 256
York, England, mint-place, 75, 149, 309
Zelizer, Viviana, 9
Zeno (Byzantine/East Roman emperor) (476–91), office-peddling, 219