Contents

Preface xi

Acknowledgments xvii

Section I. The Strange World of Education in the Roman Empire

1 Education in the Roman Empire

2 The Social and Historical Significance of Rhetorical Education

Section II. Killing Julius Caesar as the Tyrant of Rhetoric

3 The Carrion Men

4 Puzzles about the Conspiracy

5 Who Was Thinking Rhetorically?

Section III. Rhetoric’s Curious Children: Building in the Cities of the Roman Empire

6 Monumental Nymphaea

7 City Walls, Colonnaded Streets, and the Rhetorical Calculus of Civic Merit

ix
SECTION IV. LIZARDING, AND OTHER ADVENTURES
IN DECLAMATION AND ROMAN LAW

8 Rhetoric and Roman Law

9 The Attractions of Declamatory Law

10 Legal Puzzles, Familiar Laws, and Laws of Rhetoric
   Rejected by Roman Law

Conclusion: Rhetoric, Maker of Worlds

Notes 157

Abbreviations of Some Modern Works 229

Works Cited 231

Index 287
Education in the Roman Empire

Education in the era of Rome’s rule consisted of three main stages: first, for young children, the learning of letters and basic arithmetic in a primary school, the ludus in Latin. Then, childish things—such as mathematics—having been laid aside, from the age of seven or thereabouts came language under the “grammarian,” language taught primarily through analysis of poetry, chiefly the Iliad in the East and (when it became available) the Aeneid in the West. After the grammarian (at age fourteen or fifteen, perhaps) came several years of instruction under the rhetor, the rhetorician, who taught rhetoric and its theory. This was accomplished primarily by “declamation,” giving and listening to speeches on imagined topics—topics that were similar or identical East and West and over many centuries. In the West at least, deliberative topics—suasoriae or speeches of advice, often given to or in the character of a famous historical or mythic personage—tended to be taught first, and then controversiae, imaginary court-cases. By the late second century BC, but likely even earlier, an intermediate curriculum, a sequence of progymnasmata or praexercitamina, “preliminary exercises” (preliminary to declamation, that is) had evolved between grammar and rhetoric.

Although the curriculum was static, where it was taught and the people who taught it varied considerably. The children of the rich might take the first, and some the second, stages at home with private tutors; if only the first stage was provided at home they might start at the school of the grammarian at a younger age. In grand families in the Latin West much of early education might be given in Greek and through Greek texts, to promote the bilingualism hoped for in young men of rank; the Greek East did not return the compliment by learning Latin, except under the late empire and at a later stage of education. Whether the rhetor or grammarian taught the progymnasmata, or how they were divided between those worthies, varied, as did the number and order of those exercises. Slaves and the children of the poor stayed on at the (very cheap) ludus until they had the words and numbers necessary for the futures their parents or masters envisioned for them, or until the money ran out (free education being unknown), never advancing to the far more expensive grammarian and rhetor—the privilege of the rich and socially ambitious—who taught nothing useful for business, unless it was the business of language itself. If their trade needed computational skills beyond those of the ludus, poor children and slaves might attend the no less modest school of the calculator, the teacher of arithmetic; after that, if there was money left, came apprenticeship.

Rich young men who pursued the course of education under grammarian and rhetor to its end would learn much poetry, read much oratory (especially Demosthenes if Greek-speaking or Cicero if Latin-), and incidentally consume some unsystematic history and philosophy if the authors were regarded as good models of style (as Plato and Xenophon were). Education at the level of grammarian and rhetor might be expected to be available in any major town. But systematic instruction in, say, philosophy, was yet a further stage of education beyond the instruction of the rhetor, and in most periods was undertaken only by a tiny number of enthusiasts and often required a long and expensive stay in a city far away, ideally violet-crowned Athens. How education in what we anachronistically call the “professions,” architecture and especially medicine, fit in, we must honestly confess that we do not see clearly (for law see section iv). In the case of medicine we know both of schools that taught theory—that at Alexandria being the most famous—and of learning by apprenticeship. A guess is that lower-status aspirants became apprentices, and the sons of the wealthy (medicine being a profession that took in both) had at least some rhetoric before they moved to... medical school and subsequently (we devoutly hope) attached themselves for a period to a practicing doctor. In the education of the doctor we know best, Galen, we see ghostly traces of a parallel course of education, where philosophy replaced rhetoric after grammar. How common this was, other than that it appears to have been far less common than education in rhetoric, we cannot say.

Education through the level of declamation under the rhetor was general among the sons of the ruling class of the empire: those of Roman senators, equestrians, and the far more numerous sons of the prosperous class who made up the city councils, the curiae or boulai, that governed the cities of the empire—and thus, in practice, governed the empire, whose administration was for the most part divided among its cities. These were the boys who would grow up to make the great decisions of town and empire; and, if inclined, they might also read and write literary works, the ruling and writing classes of the empire being for the most part indistinguishable.

The Evolution of Rhetorical Education

The tale of the ascendency of rhetoric begins in epic Greece, with the predilection even of heroes for taking great decisions after public debate and deliberation. In Homer, among whose bloody-handed barons little trace of democracy can be found, public assemblies are held and the heroes compete in, and admire, eloquence in council. In one of Homer’s most striking similes we meet Odysseus, standing with his eyes cast down and his staff still, uttering “words like unto the snowflakes of winter, and then no mortal man could vie with him.”

About the ultimate origins of formal rhetorical instruction in Greece there is inscrutable controversy; good fortune that it matters little to us. But whether they presided over classrooms or not, by the late fifth century BC there were men in Greece—“sophists”—who would teach you public speaking, if you could afford it, of whom the best-known is Gorgias of Leontini, who arrived in Athens—subsequently the center of such instruction—in 427 BC, when the Peloponnesian War was raging. It is natural to associate the demand for training in speaking with the mass assemblies and lawyerless law courts of the Athenian democracy, and this temptation should not be too much resisted. But every Greek state of which we have knowledge, even where local ways limited the franchise, knew both public deliberation by debate and cases at law decided by weighing the competing speeches of litigants: Gorgias was a success even in rude Thessaly, and such habits existed at Sparta as well, even if Spartan men practiced their famous “laconic” speech, in which they competed in brevity and pith. We may perhaps trace this Spartan idiosyncrasy to the same passage of the Iliad in which Odysseus’s eloquence was praised: Menelaus, Homer’s king of Sparta, “spoke fluently, in few words but clear, for he was not verbose nor did he speak at random,” and so, in the same way, did his countrymen the Spartans speak for centuries after him.

Suffice to say that by the second half of the fourth century BC—by the period of the anonymous Rhetoric to Alexander and Aristotle’s Rhetoric—rhetoric was a mature intellectual discipline divided into three sorts—forensic, for the courts; deliberative, for the assemblies and councils and to give advice to potentates; and finally, demonstrative or display, mostly panegyric, the oratory of praise. There was a teaching curriculum, and one of the two main later theoretical arms of rhetoric, idea theory (which taxonomized style and delivery) was already quite developed. The period after the death of Alexander is a dark place in our evidence. Very little educational material survives. But it is generally agreed—at least for cities with significant Greek populations—that in this period classroom instruction in rhetoric became generally available, was mostly standardized, and that by the second century BC at the latest, the name we associate with this is Hermagoras, the second great arm of rhetorical theory, stasis theory (status in Latin, which investigated the fundamental issue at stake in a speech) had also become mature. Declamation, the method by which advanced rhetoric was taught, also developed in this period, although it had earlier roots. And it is likely that, lost to us in the Captain-Nemo murk of the era, there was fought the titanic battle that by the first century BC left the science of the grammarian—the rule-bound manner of writing and speech at some distance from everyday usage that was taught by microscopic analysis of poetry, in no way an inevitable preliminary to the study in rhetoric—triumphantly in charge of education at the intermediate stage.29

What we really want to know, of course, is how much time in any era the average Greek or Roman boy from a wealthy family spent learning rhetoric. The traditional education of upper-class Athenians was split between letters, music, and athletics.30 Education in “music” (which included poetry, and its composition, not merely recitation), continued strong in the Greek-speaking Hellenistic world.31 So too did athletics thrive: the gymnasion was one of the characteristic institutions of the Hellenistic city, as was the ephebeia, a one-to-three year course of military training found in many cities.32 It may, however, be significant that while grave reliefs from Classical Athens had shown departed youths naked, as athletes, by the late second century BC the grave reliefs of young men from Smyrna represent the departed clothed and grasping book-rolls—emphasizing, in other words, their literary education.33 What of intellectual subjects other than grammar and rhetoric? Plato advocated that boys be taught mathematics beyond the calculations necessary in the vegetable market, to include number theory, geometry, astronomy, and the theory of music.34 After the death of Alexander we come to hear of the enkyklios paideia, the “encyclic” or “complete” or “general” education. This included grammar and rhetoric, and also dialectic, arithmetic, music theory, geometry, and astronomy.35 But Ilse-traut Hadot showed as early as 1984 that if this broader education existed at all, it was limited to Athens and to those preparing for further study in philosophy, which most young men had no ambitions to pursue, while the term enkyklios paideia (artes liberales in Latin) itself was so vague that it could apply to nearly any formal education undertaken by persons of superior social standing, and was frequently applied to the overwhelmingly common narrow education in language and public speaking.36 Reality was apparently more like the Clouds, where Aristophanes presents as available a paid education in Socrates’s phrontisterion, or “thinking shop,” concerning the nature of the universe, astronomy, geometry, theoretical geography, the theory of grammar, meteorology, biology, and musical theory, but his prospective student wishes to learn nothing but rhetoric, to help him in court and to allow him to evade his creditors.

When Greek education spread to Rome, there was nothing left but grammar and rhetoric. Two routes to that end were possible. The disinclination of Romans to exercise naked and the social stigma attaching to theatrical or musical performance at Rome may account for the loss of Greek athletics and music, and the fact that there was no regular training for Roman soldiers until the reign of Augustus, and then only for the lower ranks—the Romans preferring their warriors to learn by experience—may have rendered superfluous organized military training such as the Greek ephebeia. Alternatively, there may have been little to change. For reasons unclear, inscriptions attesting Greek educational institutions—fees for teachers, honors for visiting lecturers, contests in athletics and poetry—become rarer in the course of the first century BC. This might be no more than a matter of epigraphical fashion, and the Hellenistic education system might still have been lively, although less visible to us. Or it could be that Greek education was itself narrowing, and that the Roman curriculum mostly limited to grammar and rhetoric was not the result of Roman philistinism and prudishness, but was the curriculum that contemporary Greek boys were already, for the most part, following.

When we consider Rome, the question is not when rhetorical training became available—we can see it from 161 BC, when Greek teachers of rhetoric were ordered expelled, and it was probably a good deal older—but, again, how intensively it was pursued in earlier times. Among the lofty class of which we can see something, military service, potentially starting at seventeen, was obligatory until the late second century BC (and it was best undertaken as early as possible by those intending a political career, ten campaigns being required before election to quaestor), while many young men continued to go to war long after such service had ceased to be compulsory. The teaching of rhetoric in the classroom had also to fight for time with what scholars traditionally call the tirocinium fori, an apprenticeship in public life of a year or more that involved following a great man around, a practice that was still very much alive in the late 60s BC, probably into the 40s, and perhaps later as well. The facts that teachers of Latin rhetoric endured the formal disapproval of the censors in 92 BC and that the 80s saw the first rhetorical treatises in Latin that survive to us (with the same declamatory themes—situations or scenarios—that would be used centuries later) illustrates, again, that such training was available, but not how prevalent it was; nor is there any other direct evidence. But perhaps there is a hint. Members of the generation of Roman politicians born around 85 BC (the generation of Brutus and Cassius, about which we know a great deal) and those older than they, were very apt to go to Greece as adults to polish up their rhetorical educations. But of those born in the 60s, it was mostly teenagers who were sent. Cicero's own experience, going to Greece as an adult, and that of his son and nephew, going as teenagers, stand for many. The implication of the belated second educations of the older generation is that the rhetorical instruction they had received in Rome before or in the 60s was somehow unsatisfactory, that they felt that they were falling behind younger men, that they felt that their eloquence needed its tires rotated. Perhaps the most economical interpretation is that in the 50s BC for Romans of the highest classes an education involving much rhetoric but many other calls upon a young man's time as well passed to an education consisting mostly of language and rhetoric, including an early sojourn in Athens.

It might be thought that when in the 40s and 30s BC the Roman Republic was ruled by embattled magnates, rent by civil war, and when peace finally achieved took the form—however well concealed—of the autocratic regime of Augustus, oratory, as far less useful amidst the thud of swords on shields and decisions made privily in the overlord's court than it had been in the free Republic, would have been less valued, and that its decline would be reflected in change and decline in rhetorical education. Not so. Contemporaries certainly complained about the decline of oratory (and would long continue to do so), but they still sent their sons to learn it, and if anything the 40s and 30s, we guess, was a period when rhetorical education strengthened and was further formalized. For once we arrive in the Roman Empire, a standard set and sequence of primary, grammatical, and rhetorical education is clearly occupying all or almost all of the educational time of most upper-class boys, and change in education practice—never fast—thereafter becomes even slower. And between the 40s and the reign of Augustus a battle over style in Latin oratory—a group of purists who called themselves “Atticists” accused the more ornamented speeches of some of their contemporaries of “Asianism”—was fought to exhaustion. Students in the rhetorical schools of that period would presumably have had to tread as carefully through that battlefield as they did through the contemporary battlefields of war and politics. And regardless of how picayune the controversy appears to us, it assures us of the intellectual liveliness of the field of rhetoric in that epoch.

On the Greek side, the late second or early third century AD saw the development of the Hermogenic corpus of three—eventually five—guidebooks for teachers (modern scholars think only two of them are really by Hermogenes; no matter), and the use of these became standard in late antiquity once the rival system of Minucianus had been put to flight. The role of epideictic (demonstrative) oratory—the display oratory of praise (mostly) and blame—in the curriculum remains a puzzle. Encomium was certainly taught among the progymnasmata, before declamation, but while one author of a work on progymnasmata strongly implies that the topic would be returned to later, presumably at a more advanced level, a second insists that it was taught only there. Evidence for epideictic school declamations (at the highest level of teaching, in contrast to the more basic progymnasmata), is, moreover, lacking, in both Greek and Latin, although declamations in the other two genres might naturally contain encomiastic passages. The best solution may be that, under the Empire, over time the progymnasmatic exercise of encomium was simply given a larger and larger proportion of the time at that stage of teaching. Perhaps the culmination of this trend is the fourth-century AD sophist Athanasius of Alexandria, who thought encomium should be taught first and that most of the other progymnasmatic exercises should be taught as parts of it. Still, at its highest levels, and in both Greek and Latin, the curriculum remained dominated by deliberative declamation (suasoriae) and especially forensic declamation (controversiae). In the former, the teacher proposed a theme such as “Agamememnon considers whether or not to sacrifice Iphigenia,” or “Advise Sulla, in a public meeting, whether to resign his dictatorship.” Here the speaker had both to adjust his tone to the figure he was addressing and the figure he, as speaker, was impersonating (it being difficult for a boy to represent an elder of great deeds and dignity). And he must also master stasis, especially whether this was a matter of honor, expediency, or necessity, and know the subcategories of each. Finally, he must also be prepared to arouse the full range of emotions in his listeners.

In a forensic declamation the teacher chose one or several from a set of laws traditional to the practice. Perhaps, “An action at law shall lie against him who violates a tomb.” The teacher then created a scenario that set this law against another, or against apparent justice: “A hero lost his weapons in combat, so he borrowed a set from the tomb of a dead hero. After fighting valiantly for his city, he returned the weapons. He is charged with violating the tomb.” The declaimer must then either prosecute or defend the hero. In variations the rules might be implicit (stating the illegality of crimes such as murder being superfluous) and the scenarios posited wonderfully intricate:

A man had a blind son whom he had made his heir. He then married a stepmother [the Roman reader would know that stepmothers are almost invariably wicked] and removed the boy to the secluded part of the house. In the night, when he lay in his bedroom with the stepmother, he was murdered, and the next day his son’s sword was found affixed in the wound, and the wall between his room and that of his son bloodied with palm prints. The blind son and the stepmother accuse each other.

There were rules. The cases were supposed to be balanced enough to allow compelling speeches on both sides. The facts laid down as the basis of the declamation could not be altered: the declaimer could not produce a homicide victim alive. Laws from the real world could not be introduced (although other rhetorical laws could, and many real laws had rhetorical analogues); legal technicalities were usually avoided. “In-artificial” proofs—calling (imaginary) witnesses or proclaiming the existence of a document that settled the case—were not approved. The contest was in developing a persuasive backstory that set the stated facts in a favorable context (color in Latin), in maintaining a verbal style consistent with the nature of the litigant the declaimer was pretending to be (idea theory), in grasping the issue or issues at stake (stasis theory), in the persuasive argument of plausibilities, in evoking emotion in the hearer, in inventing sententiae, or catchy, pithy, memorable phrases. Revolting tortures could be described, but sex, never. Regional accents were scorned, voice and diction were closely watched, and only a confined lexicon of words was allowed: nothing that clanged vulgarly of the new. In the Greek world this patrol of the lexicon would eventually take the form of Atticism—not to be confused with “Atticism” in Latin, mentioned above—trying to use no word that could not be found in Athenian writers before the death of Alexander, or the early poets who were considered Attic by courtesy. Gestures too must be just so.61

There is a much-loved body of ancient complaint about declamation as a mode of teaching—a body to which Quintilian himself, by far our best known teacher of Latin rhetoric, was happy to contribute—complaining of the fancifulness of the themes, their impracticality as training for actual pleading in the courts, and the overwrought style sometimes encouraged in the schools.62 But these are all internal critiques: suggestions about how the teaching of rhetoric could achieve its agreed-upon aims better, rather than proposals for significantly different educational aims—math perhaps? home economics?—or different institutional arrangements. The triviality of traceable changes over time in this education—astonishing to us, given the complete lack of central or official regulation, legal requirements to send children to school, or a system of public examinations that would tend to hold teachers to the same material and methods—also suggests that parents were quite content with it, it being in their power to move or remove their sons at an instant.63 The third and fourth centuries AD did bring in new institutions and courses of study: now it was possible to take formal instruction in Roman law (at Beirut, Rome, and eventually elsewhere), to learn Latin (if one was a speaker of Greek), or to take instruction in shorthand writing, which last seemed for a short period to promise high preferment in imperial service. Libanius of Antioch, the fourth-century teacher of Greek rhetoric, naturally inveighed against such newfangled teaching, which is why we know about it. But careful examination of his writings reveals that he does not fear primarily that students might abandon the rhetor for such education, merely that they might curtail their time in his school or, more likely, undertake these studies—as they would philosophy—after their rhetorical training was done, and his writings suggest that only a small minority even did that. In other words, despite the contemporary carping, and despite our own wonderment, education in grammar and rhetoric appears to have been, judging by its longevity, the most successful form of education in the history of the West.
INDEX

abdicatio, 141, 143–147; and Greek term apokēruxis, 143; legality of, 144–145; as metaphorical term, 145; as a term in declamation only, 143–144. See also law, declamatory; law, Roman

About Rivers and Mountains and Things Found in Them [Ps.-Plutarch], 78

Academy, Old (Platonic), 40

accusatio ingrati liberti, 125–126, 128. See also freedman; law, Roman, and children, ungrateful accuser, false. See delator; talio

Achaean League, 49

Achilles, xii, 18, 103–104, 153

acropolis. See Capitoline; citadel actio dementiae, 135, 141–142. See also law, declamatory, on madness; law, Roman, on madness; madness actio malae tractationis, 141, 143–147. See also law, declamatory, and wife; law, Roman, and wife actio rei uxoriae, 142. See also dowry

actor, punishment of, 123

Adrianople, battle of, 23

adultery, laws about. See law, Roman advice, speeches of. See declamation, deliberative; suasoriae

Aelius Aristides, 74, 84, 90–91

Aeneid, 3

Agamemnon, 10–11

 Agesilaus, 93

Agrippa Postumus, 145

Albucius Silus, C., 136

Alcaeus, 93

Alexamenus, 49

Alexander the Great, xii, 80

Alexandria (Egypt): colonnaded streets at, 97; medical school at, 4; remarkable structures of, 103; Serapeum in, 99

Alföldi, Andreas, 23–24

Amadis de Gaulia, xii

Amazons, xi-xii

Ammianus Marcellinus, 86

amphitheater, games in, 60

Andreia, 73, 100. See also city, praise of, topics for; declamation, demonstrative, of cities

Antigoneia, 81

Antioch: city walls of, 82, 91–92, 97; colonnaded streets of, 97, 99–101; history of, 91–92; mythical history of, 80; New City, district of, 92; nymphaeum at, 81; physical description of, 81–82; praise of, 80–83, 104; thesis of, 80–81; water supply of, 80–83

Atoninus Pius (Roman emperor), 123, 137–138

Aphrodisias, 90–91

Aphthonius, 99

apokēruxis. See abdicatio

Apollo Sminthiakos, 75

Appian, 51, 54

apprenticeship, 4–5, 8–9

aqueduct, 69, 83. See also nymphaea, monumental

Argos, 76–77

Aristophanes, 7–8

Aristotle, 28; Politics of, 41; Rhetoric of, 6

arithmetic. See mathematics armed forces. See Caesar, veterans of; military training; soldiers artes liberales. See general education
arx. See Capitoline; citadel
Asca, 104
Asia Minor, competitive benefactions in, 153
Asianism (style of oratory), 10 assassins of Caesar. See conspirators against Caesar astronomy, 7
Athanasius of Alexandria, 10
Athens: buildings at, 156; Hadrianic fountain at, 190n10; Herodes Atticus, accused of being tyrant at, 149; Odeon at, 148; place for further education, 4, 9; plague at, 149; ruling class in, 6; sophists at, 5–6, 148–149; water supply of, 77
athletics, 7–8, 154, 162n39
Atlas Shrugged, xii
Atticism: as Greek vocabulary choice, 12, 18; as style of Latin oratory, 10
Atticus, friend of Cicero, 45
augury, 29, 63
Augustus (Roman emperor), 36, 39, 124, 145
Aulus Gellius, 129
Aurelian Wall (Rome), 200n49
basilica, 70
baths: in Antioch, 91; in Asia Minor, 86; complex, development of, 70, 85–86; in North Africa, 86; public and private, 79, 81–83 bees, 138, 146–147. See also law, declamatory, on bees; law, Roman, on bees benefactor. See nymphæa, monumental Beirut, 12
Bibulus (son of Porcia), 53
bilingualism, 4, 12, 45, 149
biology, 7
Bloomer, W. Martin, 19–20, 167n29
bodyguard: Caesar’s Spanish, 55, 62–63; of a tyrant, 55 Boeotia, 77–78
book-rolls. See scrolls
boule. See city council
Bourdieu, Pierre, 20
Britain, walls in, 94
Brundisium, 133–134
brutalism (architectural style), 67
Brutus, Decimus Junius (conspirator against Caesar), 29–31, 35, 41–42, 183n71; age of, 44–45. See also conspirators against Caesar
Brutus, Lucius Junius, 42–43
Brutus, Marcus Junius (conspirator against Caesar), 9, 30–33, 49–50, 52, 54; age of, 44–45; family tradition of, 42–43; as legal and constitutional rigorist, 38–39, 175n14; as orator, 44; philosophy of, 31, 37, 39–41, 44, 48; rhetorical education of, 44–50 (see also tyrannicide; tyrant); speech of after assassination of Caesar, 31, 33, 37, 49–50, 51, 56 (see also conspirators against Caesar); and wife Porcia, 52–53
Bucolianus (conspirator against Caesar), 171n7
Butler, Judith, 20

Caesar, Gaius Julius: assassination of, xiii-xiv, 29–36, 55, 154; assassins of (see conspirators against Caesar); bodyguard of (see bodyguard); campaign against Parthians, 62; clemency of, 53; funeral of, 36, 54; inaction of before assassination, 62–63; influence of rhetorical education on, 62–63; last words of, 171n9; modern writings on assassination of, 169n1; mother of, 17; official will of, 36; supporters of, 29–31, 34, 37, 40–41, 48; veterans of, 33–34, 38; viewed as king, 42; viewed as tyrant, 32–33, 45–46, 62–63
calculator, 4, 160n12
California, xi-xii
Caligula (Roman emperor), 14–15, 60, 126
Callipus of Athens, 40
Calpurnius Flaccus, 158n4

For general queries, contact webmaster@press.princeton.edu
Campus Martius, 29, 32, 34

Canal, ornamental, 67, 102–103. See also colonnaded street; nymphaea, monumental cap of liberty, 32. See also coinage

Capitollion (Jordan), 90

Capitoline Hill: as fortification, inadequacy of, 57; as meeting place after Caesar’s assassination, 32, 38, 46, 49; as refuge for Caesar’s assassins, 32–33, 35, 37–38; siege of, 34, 45, 57; speech of Brutus on, 54; tyrannicides process down from, 52. See also citadel

Caracalla (Roman emperor), 140
carcer, 134
Carthage, 96

Casca, Servilius (conspirator against Caesar), 30, 38, 43

Cassius Dio, 51–55; on Porcia (Brutus’s wife), 52–53

Cassius Longinus (conspirator against Caesar), 9, 30, 32–33, 38, 40, 43, 54; age of, 44–45, 49–50; Epicureanism of, 176n22

Cassius, Lucius (brother of Cassius Longinus), 38

Cassius Severus, joke of, 108–109, 136

Catiline, 44

Cato the Younger, 52–53

Celsus (jurist), 138, 146
centumviri, court of, 135, 141
centuriate assembly, 43
centurions, 126

Cervantes, xi

Chion, 40

Chōra (region in which a city lies), 73. See also city, praise of, for physical position; declaration, demonstrative, of cities

Christianity, 124, 154

Chronology, March 15–17, 44 BC, 172–173n12

Cicero: and assassination of Caesar, 32, 37–38, 44, 49–50, 52, 55; Brutus of, 44; education of, 9, 16–17; oratory of, 4; and praise for Marcus Brutus, 44; and Roman law, 112, 135; and senatus consultum ultimum, 44; speech after Caesar’s assassination, 54; and theses, 45; Topica of, 114; Verrines of, 77; writings justifying murder of Caesar, 179–180n15. See also theses

Cimber, Tillius (conspirator against Caesar), 29–30, 38–39

Cincinnatus, 43

Cinna, Cornelius (conspirator against Caesar), 32–33, 35–36, 38; speech of, 45–46, 50

Cinna, Helvius (unfortunate poet), 36

Circus, 61

citadel (acropolis or arx): as an admirable building in a town, 91; as residence for a tyrant, 54–55, 56–60, 62, 182n64; seized by a tyrant, 47–48; site for tyrannicide, 54–55, 185n12; tyrannicide escorted down from, 47–48, 52. See also Capitoline; Palatine Hill

Cities, comparisons of, 101–105. See also declamation, demonstrative, and ranking cities citizenship, fictive, 146, 223–224n40

city, praise of, 71–76, 87, 92; for age, 90; for climate, 103; in coinage, 101, 150; for colonnaded streets, 98–101; for constitution, 73; competition in, 74, 80–83, 92, 103–105; inscriptions with, 102; and laws of inheritance, 73; for noises found in, 104–105; for nymphae, 83–87; for origin, 72, 76, 103; for physical position, 72–76; and rankings with other cities, 103–104; rules for, 71–73, 103–104; and similarity to people, 72–76, 87; for size and growth, 90–91, 97, 100–101, 103–104; topics for, 72–73, 100, 103–104; in treatises, 104–105; and treatment of dead, 73; for its virtues, 73, 103–104; for walls, 198n17 (see also city walls); for water supply, 74–85, 87, 90, 155; and women, 73. See also laudantur urbes similiter atque homines

City council: administration of, 150–151; composition of, 5–6, 150–151; praise of, 81; and rhetorical education, 153–154

For general queries, contact webmaster@press.princeton.edu
city walls: in Africa, 94, 199n30; of Antioch, 91; in Asia Minor, 94; benefactors of, 90; in Britain, 94, 199n30; building of during Roman peace, 93–95; building techniques for, 91; in Carthage, lack of, 96; on coinage, 95; colonial status, associated with, 96; competition in, 66, 94, 96; of Cyzicus, 91; dates, 90, 196n44; dignity of, 95; discouragement of, 65–66, 88–89, 93, 96–97, 155; expansion of city beyond, 95; expense of, 89, 93; in fifth century AD, 96–97; in Gaul, 90, 93–95; in Germania, 94; in Greek-speaking East, 90, 196n4; Greek tradition of, 95; ideological motives for building of, 95–96; impracticality of, 89–90, 94, 196n12; lack of, in most western cities, 94; in the Latin West, 90, 93–95; in the Levant, 94; neglect of, 94; neglected in demonstrative declamation, 91–92; and ornamental gates, 94–95; oversized circuit of, 90; praise of, 72, 91; private structures built on, 94–95; rationale for building of, 66, 88–90, 93–95, 97; as a reflection of virtues of a city, 91, 198n17; as a refuge for cowards, 93; repair and renovation of, 90, 94; in Roman culture, 95–96; as sacred boundaries, 95–96; size of, 90, 92; of Smyrna, 91; in Spain 93–95; in Sparta, lack of, 93; in Thucydides, 93; in Trier, 89fig.4, 94; virtues of, 91, 95. See also declamation, deliberative; declamation, demonstrative, and cities

Claudius (Roman emperor), 125

Clearchus, 40
clothing, social standing evident in, 16, 133
cognitio extra ordinem, 108–109, 140. See also stellionatus coinage: of Alexandria, 78; of Brutus, 39 (and Cassius), 42, 44; and city walls, 95; and competition between cities, 101, 150; of Ephesus, 78–79; local rivers on, 78–79; marked with an alpha, 101; nymphaea on, 85; of Perge, 101; of Side, 101; of Smyrna, 78; and water supply, 78–79, 83, 85 colonies, city walls of, 96
colonnade, 91, 97, 99, 201n53
colonnaded street: in Alexandria, 97; in Antioch, 92, 97, 99–101; in Asia Minor, 97, 102, 105; benefactors of, 98; building of compared to nymphaea, 97–99; and climate, 99–100; competition between cities in, 99–105; contemporaneous building of, 98; dates of, 97; definition of, 201n54; demonstrating size of city, 92, 100; development of, 70; distribution throughout city of, 100; in encomia on cities, 99; funding of, 98; to gain respect of Roman authorities, 99; in Greece, 97–98, 201–202n54; in Greek-speaking East, 97–98; inscriptions on, 98; lack of, 97–98; in the Levant, 97, 99; location of, 97, 99–100; modern literature on, 200n51–52; and monumental nymphaea, similar influences on, 97–98; nymphaea, associated with, 67, 79; in North Africa, 97–99; in the northwestern provinces, 97, 201–202n54; with ornamental canal, 67, 102–103; in Perge, 102, 105; in Prusa, 99, 101; in Rome, 97, 99; in Side, 102, 105; in Syria, 97–98; and thesis, 99–101; in treatises, 99, 105; in Tyre, 98; usefulness of, 100–101; value of, 102; and virtues of a city, 100–101 color (imagined circumstances of a declamation), 12, 114, 135–136, 141, 183n71, 208–209n31 columns: in colonnaded streets, 98 (see also colonnaded street); on nymphaea, 69–70 (see also nymphaea, monumental) Commodus (Roman emperor), 123
comparatio, 104–105. See also cities, comparison of; declamation, demonstrative, and ranking cities competition in oratory. See rhetorical competition complaints about declamation, 12–13, 20–21, 154 complete education. See general education comportment in speeches, 16
Constantine (Roman emperor), 120–121, 124–125, 129–130, 139
Constantinople: city walls of, 82
Constantius (Roman emperor), 120–121 consul, 31, 33–36, 38–39, 44, 148. See also Antony, Mark, as consul countersiae, 3, 10–11, 17, 45. See also declamation, forensic Corinth, 77, 85
Cornelia, mother of Gracchi, 17
crime, nameless. See nameless crime crime, novel. See nameless crime cruelitas, 185n15, 186n19
Cuicul, 86
Cujas, Jacques, 108
curator, 141–142, 156
curia. See city council; Pompey, Senate House of Cyzicus, 91
dagger: concealed in document boxes, 52; used to assassinate Caesar, 30, 32, 48, 52; as weapon of assassination, 43, 48, 184n12. See also Servilius Ahala; Spurius Maelius
Daphne (springs), 81
Darius, 80
decimation, 6, 54, 66, 153–154; complaints about, 12; educational value of, 15–24, 151; humanistic interpretation of, 19–21; modern interpretation of as academic accident, 19–21; as reinforcing social hierarchy, 15–22, 167–168n29–30; as subversive, 14–15, 20–22, 60, 168n33; unreality of, 116–117, 124, 144, 154–156 (see also Sophis-topolis). See also declamation, deliberative; declamation, demonstrative; declamation, forensic; role-playing decimation, deliberative, 3, 10–11, 17, 54, 151, 165n56; as countercurrent to praise of walls, 88–89, 93, 96. See also suasaories decimation, demonstrative, 10, 71; of cities, 71–76, 80–83, 97, 99–101, 103–104 (see also cities, praise of); and city walls, encouraging the building of, 88–90, 96; and city walls, reluctance in mentioning, 88, 91–92; at civic festivals, 71; and colonnaded streets, 97, 99–101; competition in (see rhetorical competition); and emperor, in praise of, 71; at funerals, 71; and governor, in praise of, 71; monarchs and potentates, in praise of, 151; of public buildings, 74, 90 (see also city walls; colonnaded street; nymphaea, monumental); and ranking cities, 103–104; and size of a city, 97; of sophists, 72; on water supply, 80–83, 88, 155 (see also Antioch; water supply); at weddings, 71, 75 decimation, forensic, 3, 10–11, 17, 45, 54, 153; family situations in, 116–117; and litigation, 151–153; modern literature on, 164n58; patria potestas, scarcity of in, 116–117, 210n48; of sophists, 5; stock characters in (see role-playing); on tyrannicide (see tyrannicide). See also controversiae decimation, laws of. See law, declamatory delator, punishment of, 129–130, 147. See also law, declamatory, on false accusations; reciprocity, and Roman morals dementiae actio. See actio dementiae Demosthenes, 4 dictator, 11, 29, 36, 38, 43, 62. See also Caesar, Gaius Julius diction, 12, 17
Digest of Justinian. See Justinian, Digest of dikaiosunē (justness), 73. See also city, praise of, for its virtues; declamation, demonstrative, of cities dikē paranoias. See madness Dio Chrysostom, 73, 75, 99–101 Diocletian (Roman emperor), legal constitution of, 126, 143–144 Diodorus Siculus, 103 Dion of Syracuse, 40 Dionysius the Younger, 40 disinheritance. See abdicatio; law, declamatory, and disinheritance of a child; law, Roman, and disinheritance of a child divorce. See law, declamatory, on divorce; law, Roman, on divorce; raptarum lex doctors, as tyrannicides, 180n58 Dolabella, Cornelius (conspirator against Caesar), 33–34, 36, 39, 50 dōlus, 108 Domitian (Roman emperor), 14–15, 126; as tyrant, 56–62 domus Domitiana. See Palatine Hill, as citadel Don Quixote, xi donatio, 127 donor. See nymphaea, monumental, benefactors of dowry, 121, 124, 138, 142, 147 Dr. Seuss, 22 economics, xv, 24 ecphrasis, 99 Egypt, 82, 103, 143, 149 education, ancient: in architecture, 4; in Latin, and shorthand-writing, 12–13; in medicine, 4; in music, 7–8; in Roman law, 13, 206n6. See also education, rhetorical education, rhetorical: ancient theories of value of, 15; like athletic coaching, 22; authors read in, 160n13; as competition, 17–19; demonstrative remains secondary to deliberative and forensic oratory in, 163n55; evolution of, 6–10; of jurists, 205n5; as legitimation of social rank, 166n14; modern histories of, 157–158n11; modern theories of function of, 14–22; origins of, 5–6; as preventing ways of thinking, 23–25; as role-playing (see role-playing); as reaffirming social roles, 19–20; as subversive, 14–15, 20–22; as social marker, 16 eloquence, 5–6, 15; expected in ruling class, 17, 19 enceinte. See city walls encomium. See declamation, demonstrative enkyklios paideia. See general education ephebeia, 7–8, 161n32, 199–200n35. See also athletics; military training Ephesus, 69, 79, 85, 140, 156 Epicureanism, 40, 176n22 epideictic. See declamation, demonstrative epitēdeumata (upbringing/way of life), 73. See also city, praise of; declamation, demonstrative, of cities equites, 55, 57, 126 erga (deeds), 73. See also city, praise of; declamation, demonstrative, of cities Eugenius, rebellion of, 100 Euripides, 211n49 examinations in education, 22, 169n37 exempla, 17, 141 exercises, rhetorical. See declamation; progymnasmata; theses exheredatio, 143–145. See also abdicatio; law, declamatory, and disinheritance of a child; law, Roman, and disinheritance of a child exile, punishment of, 129–130, 143. See also island, relegation to falsum, 204n2 fathers as stock characters in declamation. See role-playing, Father favor dotis. See dowry fictio civitatis, 223–224n40 figured speech, 21, 148–149. See also declamation, as subversive grammaticus, 3–4, 6–7, 17, 71
Gramsci, Antonio, 20–21
Gratian (Roman emperor), 23, 121, 127
gate reliefs, 7
Greece: place for further education, 4, 9, 36.
   See also Athens
guardian. See curator guidebooks, for teachers. See treatises gymnasium. See athletics; baths; ephebeia

Hadot, Ilsetraut, 7
Hadrian (Roman emperor), 137
Hammurabi, Code of, 130
handbook. See treatises harbor, 72, 82, 91
harenarius, 17
Harmodius and Aristogeiton, 44, 185n12
Hector, 104, 153
Heracleides Criticus, 77
Heracles, sons of, 80
Hermagoras, 6
Hermogenic corpus, 10, 145
Hero (vir fortis). See role-playing, Hero (vir fortis)
Herod the Great, 97
Herodes Atticus, 84, 148–149, 226n2
Herodotus, 103
Hierapolis, 84–85
Hipparchus (grandfather of Herodes Atticus), 149
Hipparchus (tyrant), 44
Hippias, 44
Hippocrene, 77
history, education in, 23, 155
Homer: and city walls, 95; description of water supply in Argos in, 76–77; Iliad, xii, 3, 5–6 homicide, 11, 123, 129, 134–136
   Honorius (Roman emperor), 129
hot springs, 84
humanitas (legal doctrine), 114
Huns, 23
Hydrekdocheion, of C. Laecanius Bassus, 79
hypaethral basin, 67

fortifications, city. See city walls
Forum, in Rome, 31–34, 36, 37, 45, 116
Foucault, Michel, 20–21 fountain, 67–70, 85, 91–92. See also nymphaea, monumental; springs fraud, 107, 109. See also lizarding; stellionatus fresco, of city-walls, Jordan, 90 freedman: inferior status of, 133–134; punishment of for adultery, 123; punishment of for ingratitude, 125–127; trial of those of Herodes Atticus, 148–149. See also revocatio in servitutem; role-playing Fronto, 186n28
Frontinus, 156
Fuficius Fango, 31
funeral oration, 54
furiusus. See madness

Galen, his education, 5
games, Roman. See amphitheatre, games in; circus gardens, 92
gates, city: in city walls, 92; nymphae placed near, 84; ornamental, 94–95; at Trier, 89fig.4
Geertz, Clifford, 20
general education, 7–8 genos (origins), 72, 76. See also city, praise of, for origin; declamation, demonstrative, of cities geography, education in, 23 geometry, 7. See also mathematics Georgias of Leontini, 5–6
gesture, education in, 12, 16
Gilbert and Sullivan, 130 giuridicizzazione dell’etica, 115, 118, 128. See also law, declamatory, and everyday ethics gladiators: Decimus Brutus’s, 29–33, 35, 37, 46, 54; as a profession, 139, 153
   Gordion III (Roman emperor), 87
governor, Roman, 71, 121, 140–141; and stellionatus, 108 Gracchi brothers, 17, 44
grammarien. See grammaticus idea theory, 6, 12

Ides of March, 33, 39, 62–63

Iliad. See Homer

imperial cult, 102

imprisonment: for ingratitude, 127–128. See also law, declamatory, and imprisonment of children

Inachus, 80

inartificial proofs, 11–12

indemnatos liberos liceat occidere, 117. See also declamation, forensic; patria potestas; potestas vitae necisque ingrati sit actio, 125, 128

ingratitude, 125–126. See also law, declamatory, on gratitude and ingratitude; law, Roman, on gratitude and ingratitude; talio ingratus.

Ingratia. See ingratitude

iniuria, 120, 132–133, 142, 211–212n4

See also nameless crime; stellionatus

inscription, 218–219n62

inscriptions: about benefactors, 98; about city status, 102; on colonnaded streets, 98; about competition between cities, 102; about Greek education, 8; about nymphaea, 68, 84–85; about Perge, 102; about rhetorical qualities, 18; about Side, 102; about water supply, 79–80, 83

Io, 80

Iphigenia, 11

island, relegation to, 123–124, 129. See also lex Iulia de adulteriis coercendis; lex Iulia de vi

Italica, 156

iudicium domesticum, 210n48

iurisconsulti. See jurist iurisprudentes. See jurist

ius occidenti, 214–215nn21–23

ius respondendi, 205n9

ius vitae necisque. See patria potestas; potestas vitae necisque iusurandum. See oaths

Ivanhoe, xi

James Bond, 47

John Malalas, 83, 189n7

Julian (Roman emperor), xii

Julius Caesar. See Caesar, Gaius Julius

Julius Eurycles, C., 149

Junian Latinus, 133

jurisprudence, Athenian, 108, 125, 142

jurisprudence, Islamic, 130

jurisprudence, post-classical, 112–114, 120–121

jurist, 111, 114–115, 118, 125, 129–130, 132–136, 138–141, 145–147. See also Celsius; Justinian; Labeo; Marcellus; Marcian; Modestinus; Paul; Pomponius; Ulpian; Ulpius Marcellus Justinian (Roman emperor), classicizing revival of, 112–113. See also jurisprudence, post-classical

Justinian, Codex of, 120, 122, 127, 206n1

Justinian, Digest of, 109, 111, 113, 115, 143, 206n1, 206n3

Justinian, Novella of, 122

Juvenal, 15, 165n4

king: in Asia Minor, 151; in the Middle Ages, 151; at Rome, 31, 35, 42–44, 178n46

Labeo (jurist), 133

Laecanius Bassus, C., 79

Lambaesis, 86

Laodicea, 84

Lars Porsenna, 43

laudantur urbes similiter atque homines, 72–73, 86, 91, 95. See also city, praise of, and similarity to people; city walls, dignity of law, declamatory, 108–109; 111–118; on adultery, 123–125; allure of, 111; on bees, 138, 146–147; and children, ungrateful, 126–128, 140; dates of, 115; on disinheritance of a child, 141, 143–147, 225n52 (see also abdicatio; law, Roman); on divorce, 119, 126, 141–142; and everyday ethics, 115, 118; on exposure of children, 128, 147; on false accusations, 129–131,
INDEX 295

147; familiarity of, 111, 115, 118, 134, 139–141; on gratitude and ingratitude, 125–131; and Greek law, influence of upon, 116–117, 122, 125, 127, 136, 142–144, 146; historical origins of, 116; imagined legal environment of, 117–118, 119, 124, 139, 144, 154; on imprisonment of children, 127–128; and iniuria, 132–133; and jurisprudence, Roman, 111, 115, 135, 146; and lack of influence on Roman law, 111, 135–147, 155–156; on madness, 133–136, 141–142 (see also actio dementiae; law, Roman, on madness); and manumission, 133–134, 147; and marriage, 119–122, 144; as a moot court, 139; and mutilation, 130–131, 147; number of, 147; and parallels between Roman law, 116–117, 133–134, 137–141; on poisoning, 124–125; on ravishment, 111, 118, 120, 146–147 (see also raptarum lex; raptus); and Roman moral sensibility, 121, 127–128, 132–133, 139; stock characters in, 116–117 (see also role-playing); on suicide, 136–137, 147; and technicalities, impatience with, 142–143; and the theater, 139; and wife, mistreatment of, 141–143 (see also actio malae tractationis). See also declamation, forensic law, rhetorical. See law, declamatory law, Roman: on adultery, 119–125 (see also lex Julia de adulteriis coercedcis; lex Julia de vi); appeals in, 124; autonomy of, 111; on bees, 138, 146–147; and children, ungrateful, 126–128; dates of, 115; declamatory laws, influence of on, 119–147; and disinherance of children, 141, 143–147, 228552 (see also abdicatio; law, declamatory, on disinherance of a child); on divorce, 141–142; and emperor’s influence on, 144–145; external influences on, 113–114, 132–134; evolution of, 112; on executions, 122, 124, 140, 142; and family situations, 115; on gratitude and ingratitude, 111, 125–131; and Greek law, 115, 142–143; history of, conventional, 111–113; ignorance of, 109, 111, 136, 140; influence of education in declamation on, 111, 114–115, 151; interpretation of by jurists, 112, 139–141; on legacy size, 143; as literature, 113; and local laws, influence of on, 114, 140, 146, 149–153; on madness, 135–136, 141–142 (see also actio dementiae; law, declamatory, on madness); and manumission, 133–134, 147; on marriage, 120–121, 144; and mutilation, 130–131, 147; and pardons, 122–123; and parricide, punishment of, 134–136, 139–140, 147; and patria potestas, 142, 145 (see also patria potestas); on poisoning, 124–125; on property, 122–124, 134–135, 137; on ravishment, 111, 118, 120, 146–147 (see also raptarum lex; raptus); and Republican law, 115, 133–134; resistance of to external influence, 111–112, 155–156; on revenge, 111; rhetorical jargon in, 112; and Roman moral sensibility, 121, 127–128, 130, 132–133; on sexual violence, 120; stylistic independence of, 155–156; on suicide, 136–138, 147; on upbringing of children, 128; and wife, mistreatment of, 141–143 (see also actio malae tractationis; law, declamatory, and wife, mistreatment of); on wills and ingratitude, 126–127; on wills and madness, 133–134; on wills and suicide, 136–138; writers of, 111. See also lex law of the ravished. See law, declamatory, on ravishment; law, Roman, on ravishment; raptarum lex law, vulgar. See jurisprudence, post-classical legal profession, Roman, 206n6 legal writing, relationship of to rhetoric, 111–118 leges. See law, Roman; lex Lepcis Magna, 86, 99 Lepidus, Marcus Aemilius, 31–36, 37–38, 40–41, 48, 54–56, 63; telos, Lepidus’s troops on Tiber island, 171–172n17 lex, 112, 116
lex Aelia Sentia, 125
lex Cornelia de sicariis et veneficis, 210n45, 215n24, 216n32 lex Iulia de adulteriis coercendis: penalty for violation of, 120, 123–124, 215n24. See also law, Roman, on adultery; raptarum lex; raptus lex Iulia de vi, 120, 123–124
lex Iulia et Papia, 143
lex Ianua, 133
lex raptarum. See raptarum lex
Lex Romana Burgundionum, 206n1
Lex Romana Visigothorum, 206n1
lex Roscia theatralis, 139
lex Voconia, 116
Libanius (of Antioch), 12–13, 16–17, 22, 80–83, 86, 91–93, 97, 99–101, 193n58, 193n64, 193–194n68 liberal arts. See general education libertas, 39. See also cap of liberty; coinage Library of Celsus, 69 Life on the Mississippi, xi literature, education in, 7
litigation, prevalence of, 152–153
Livius Drusus, 44
Livy, 49, 55, 117
lizard, 107. See also stellio, stellionatus lizarding: definitions of, 107–109. See also stellionatus; Ulpian longi temporis praescriptio, 121–122. See also raptarum lex
Lucan, 155
Lucian, 48–49
ludus, 3–4, 17, 158n1, 159–160n11
luxuriosus (profligate), 145
Lycia-Pamphylia. See Perge; Side
Macedonia, 125
MacMullen, Ramsay, 23–24
madness, 135–136, 141–142. See also actio dementiae; law, declamatory, on madness; law, Roman, on madness maiestas, 129, 137
Majorian (Roman emperor), 123
Major Declamations [Ps.-Quintilian], 138; dates, 158n4
Malleolus, 134–136, 139–140. See also querela inofficiosi testamenti Manlius Capitolinus, Marcus, 43, 55, 185n12 mannerisms, physical. See gesture Mantovani, Dario, 138 manumission, 126, 133–134, 147; revoked, 125. See also law, declamatory, and manumission; law, Roman, and manumission manus, 117
Marathon, battle of, 18
Marcellus (jurist): and stellionatus, use of, 108
Marcian (jurist), 146; on suicide, 137; and use of color insaniae, 135; and use of the word exorare, 122–123; and use of word raptus, 120–122; and use of the word veneficium, 125
Marcus Aurelius (Roman emperor), 86, 123; and celebrated trial of Herodes Atticus, 148–149
Marnas (river), 78–79
marriage, in laws on abduction. See law, declamatory, on ravishment; law, Roman, on ravishment; raptarum lex Marrou, Henri-Irénée, 23
mathematics, 3–4, 7, 23
Mattern, Susan, 24
Maximian (Roman emperor), legal constitution of, 143–144
medicine, education in, 4–5, 155, 160n16
Menander Rhetor, 74–75, 91, 103–104
Menelaus, 6
Meta Sudans, 70
metaphors, in speeches, 82–83
meteorology, 7
metropolis, city-title of, 101–102
Mikado, 130
Miletus, nymphaeum at, 68fig.3, 87
military training, 7–8, 128. See also ephebeia Miltiades, 18
Minerva, 77
Minor Declamations [Ps.-Quintilian]: dates, 158n4
Minucianus (grammarian), 10
Minucius Basilus (conspirator against Caesar), 30
Modestinus (jurist): and stellionatus, use of, 108
Mommsen, Theodor, 39, 175n17
Monody on Nicomedia, 97. See also Libanius
Morgan, Teresa, 16
mosaics, 83
murder. See conspirators against Caesar; homicide Muses, structures devoted to, 91
music, education in, 7–8, 162n39 mutilation, 130–131. See also law, declamatory, and mutilation; law, Roman, and mutilation; talio myths, use of in speeches, 10–11, 18, 80, 93
Nabis, 49
nameless crime, 108–109, 147. See also inscripti maleficii sit actio; stellionatus
Naso, Publius (conspirator against Caesar), 38
Natural History (Pliny the Elder), 77
New City, district of Antioch, 92, 100
neokoros (temple-warden to the emperor), 102
Nero (Roman emperor), 126
Nicolaus of Damascus, 51
Nile, 78, 82
Novara, 136
noverca (step mother). See role-playing, Step-mother nymphaeum, monumental: adaptation of other buildings into, 69; in Antioch, 81; and aqueducts, 67, 69; in Asia Minor, 68–70, 78–79, 83–87; benefactors of, 68–71, 85, 148; and climate, influence of, 85–86, 155; competition in among cities, 71, 83–87, 102, 105; competition in among ruling class, 70–71, 85; and colonnaded streets, 97–98, 100; and culture of philotimia, 85; definition of, 189n1; development of, 69–70; in Ephesus, 78; funding of, 68–69; in Gaul, 85–86; in Greece, 69, 85; of Herodes Atticus, 84, 148; imitative of, 86–87; on inscriptions, 84–85; in late antiquity, 68; in the Latin West, 69, 85–86; as legitimate public buildings, 84; in the Levant, 69, 83, 85; location of, 68, 84; modern scholarship on, 189n1, 189n6; motivation for building an academic accident, 70–71, 76; in North Africa, 69, 85–87, 99; in Perge, 102, 105; popularity of in certain parts of the Empire, 85–87, 155; rationale for, 68; repairs to, 69, 85; Roman prototypes of, 70; in Rome, 69, 85–86; sculptures on, 79; and the Septizodium 86–87; in Side, 102, 105; standard design of, 67–68; in Syria, 69, 83, 85; value of, 102; and water supply, 67–68, 70–71, 85–86, 90, 155; and water technology, 69–70
Nymphaeum of the Tritons (Hierapolis), 84
oaths, 136–137
Octavian. See Augustus
Odeon, at Athens, 148
Odysseus, xii, 5
Old Testament, 130
Olympia, nymphaeum at, 84, 148
Olympias (spring at Antioch), 80–81 oratory, decline of, 9–10, 23; theories of, 6–7, 114. See also idea-theory; stasis-theory Orcistus, 79–80, 83, 85–86
Orontes, 81–82, 92
Ovid, 144, 155
Oxford Handbook of Roman Law and Society, 207n11, 209n33
Palace, of Domitian. See Palatine Hill, as citadel Palatine Hill, as citadel, 56–57, 58–60fig.1–2; 62. See also Capitoline; citadel Palmyra, colonnaded street of, 98, 98fig.5
Panathenaic Way, 44
Panegyric. See declamation, demonstrative
Panegyric (of Pliny the Younger), 56
Index

Pannonia, 148–149
papyrus: about fountains, 84; petitions, 149, 152–153 parricide, 134–136, 139–140, 147; in declamation, modern literature on, 223n134 Parthians, 62
patrua potestas, 19, 21, 43, 116–117, 127, 140, 142, 145, 210n48
Paul (jurist): and stellionatus, definition of, 108
Pausanias, 77
pecudium, 117; castrense, 128
Peirene fountain, 77, 85
Perge: and competition with Side, 101–105; statue on nymphaeum at, 79
Pernot, Laurent 73
Persians, 93
personae in declamation. See role-playing Petra, 156
Petronius, 154
Philippi, battle of, 39
Philopoemen, 49
philosophy, education in, 5, 23, 155; popularity of with the Roman ruling class, 40–41 Philostratus, 84
philotimia (love of honor), 85
phronēsis (wisdom), 73. See also city, praise of, for its virtues; declamation, demonstrative, of cities phrontisterion, 7. See also Aristophanes; Socrates physical education. See athletics
pietas, 19, 128
pignora, 107
pirates, 45, 117, 127–128, 144
Plato: advice of, 7; as model of good style, 4; students of, 40; on tyrants, 40–41
Platonism: and “philosopher-king,” 40; and tyranny, 40–41
Pliny the Elder, 77, 107, 145
Pliny the Younger, 56, 126, 129
Plutarch: Brutus of, 51–53; Caesar of, 51–52, 62; corpus of, 78; on Sparta’s lack of walls, 93
poena cullei. See Malleolus poetry, 3, 6–7, 93, 155 poisoning, 124–125. See also law, declamatory, on poisoning; law, Roman, on poisoning polis. See republics, constitutional Polyaenus, 53
pompeia, 95
Pompeii, 67
Pompey (Gnaeus Pompeius Magnus), xii; Portico of, 29, 32; Senate House of, 29–32, 37, 39, 54–55, 62–63; Theater of, 31
Pomponius (jurist), 133–134
Pomponius Mela, 77
poor man as stock character in declamation. See role-playing, Poor Man Porcia (wife of Marcus Junius Brutus), 52–53.
See also Cassius Dio; Plutarch; Polyaeus; suicide; torture; Valerius Maximus Porta Nigra (Trier), 89fig, 4, 94
portico. See colonnade; colonnaded street; columns Portico of Pompey. See Pompey
potestas vitae necisque, 117, 140. See also indennatos liberos liceat occidere; patria potestas
Prefect of Egypt, 152
praetor, 32, 49, 109, 132–133; duties of, 38–39, 152; tuitio (over freedmen) of, 220n7
Praetor’s Edict, 112, 132–133
Praetorian Prefect, 149
praise, rhetoric of. See declamation, demonstrative praxeis (deeds), 73. See also city, praise of, for its virtues; declamation, demonstrative, of cities preliminary exercises. See progymnasmata praexercitamina. See progymnasmata primary school. See ludus
privatum (type of legal case), 108 progymnasmata (preliminary rhetorical exercises), 3–4, 10, 71, 93, 99, 159n6, 190n18 propaganda, rhetorical education as, 152 Prusa, 99, 101
publicum (type of legal case), 108
quaestor, 8, 43; late-antique, 207n10
querela inofficiosi testamenti, 134–136, 141;
modern literature on, 221n12. See also madness Quintilian, 12, 22, 57; on abdicatio, 141, 143;
on actio dementiae, 141–142; on actio malae tractationis, 141–143; authors cited in, 160n13; on city walls, 88, 90–91; on declamatory laws, 141–143; Minor Declama-tions ascribed to, see Minor Declama-tions; Major Declamations ascribed to, see Major Declama-tions; on praising cities and people, 72–74, 88, 90 rape, laws about. See law, declamatory, on ravishment; law, Roman, on ravishment; raptarum lex raptarum lex, 119–123; familiarity with, 121; penalty for, 121; time limit for legal complaint about, 121–122. See also law, declamatory, on ravishment; law, Roman, on ravishment; raptor; raptus raptor, 119; 121–123, 213n11. See also law, Roman, on ravishment; raptarum lex raptus, 118, 120, 213n11; as a term in Roman law, 120–122, 146–147; uncertainty about in Roman law, 120, 211–212n4. See also law, Roman; raptarum lex; raptor ravishment, laws about. See law, Roman, on ravishment; raptarum lex; raptor reading, influence on life of, xi-xii reciprocity, and Roman morals, 127–131, 147.
See also talio
Regifugium, 42
regiae, 114
regulation, in education system, 12
relegatio, 143. See also abdicatio; exheredatio; exile; island, relegation to republics, cities of Empire as constitutional, 150–151
revocatio in servitutem, 216n36
rhetor, 3–5, 71–73, 75–76, 80, 99, 108, 148;
execution of, 60; expulsion of, 8, 12–13
rhetoric: influence on Greco-Roman literature, xiii; limitations on such influence, 157n10–11; modern histories of, 158n2
Rhetoric to Alexander, 6
Rhetorica ad Herennium, 135 rhetorical competition: exploitation of, 153; in Greece, 18–19; regarding water supply, 76–83 (see also city, praise of, for water supply; Libanius; nymphaea, monumental; water supply); among ruling class, 17–20, 22–23, 153–154; among sophists, 18–19 rhetorical education. See education, rhetorical rhetorical exercises. See declamation; progymnasmata; theses
rhetorician. See rhetor rich man as stock character in declamation. See role-playing, Rich Man rivers, 76–78; in Antioch, 91; on coinage, 78–79. See also coinage, water supply roads: important in location of nymphaea, 84 role-playing, 11, 19, 22; in deliberative declamation, 93, 115–117; Father, 21, 45, 116, 127–128, 131, 135, 137, 144; in forensic declamation, 45; freedman, 19, 127, 133–134; from Greek New Comedy, 117; Hero (vir fortis), 45, 47, 117 (in war), 124; modern literature on, 167n27, 168n10; Poor Man, 21, 45, 117, 126, 132, 138; Rich Man, 21, 45, 47, 117, 126, 132, 138; Son, 21, 116, 117 (Profligate), 124, 127–128, 131, 135, 137, 144; Step-mother (noverca), 11, 19, 21, 117; slave, 19, 133–134; Tyrannicide, 45–50; woman, 19, 21, 144
Rome: fire at in AD 80, 57; water supply of, 82
Romulus, 178n46, 184n1
root paradigm, xii-xiii
Rubrius Ruga (conspirator against Caesar), 30
Russell, Donald, 154–156. See also Sophistopolis rustic praedial servitudes, 115
saevitia, 185n15, 186n19
Saturninus, 44
Schmidt, Dr. Wilhelm Adolf, 14–15
scientific learning, 23
Scott, James C., 20–21
Scott, Sir Walter, xi
sculptures, on nymphaea, 7. See also nymphaea, monumental, sculptures on Second Sophistic, 84
Seleucus, 81, 92
Senate House of Pompey. See Pompey, Senate House of senators, and assassination of Caesar, 29–30, 32. See also conspirators against Caesar senatus consultum ultimum, 44
Seneca the Elder, 23, 132–133, 136–137, 153
Seneca the Younger, 125–127
sententia, 12
Septimius Severus (Roman emperor), 86–87, 98–99
Septizodium, 86–87, 99. See also nymphaea, monumental, and the Septizodium Serapeum at Alexandria, 99
Segas de Espandían, xi-xii
Servilia (mother of Marcus Brutus), 43
Servilius Ahala, 45, 185n10
Sestos, 103
Severus Alexander (Roman emperor), 124
sewer, 67
sex: absence of in declamation, 12; as violence (see raptarum lex; raptus)
Shakespeare, 36
Sicily, 77
Side: and competition with Perge, 101–105; three-storied nymphaeum at, 87
Silleryon, 104
Simithus, 86
Sirmium, trial of Herodes Atticus at, 148–149
slave: accompanies a boy to school, 166n13; punishment of for adultery, 123; punishment of for fleeing, 130; status of, 16–17, 133–134, 138; suicide of, 137; as a supporter of assassins of Caesar, 32; torture of, 125
Smyrna, 7, 78, 91
snails, Lusinian, 103
social class: as evidenced in clothing, 16.
See also freedman; slave
Socrates, 7–8
soldiers: arrival of at Antioch, 83; of Lepidus, 35, 48, 56; protecting borders, 94; in Rome, 31–33; as walls of Sparta, 93. See also Caesar, veterans of; military training Solinus, 77–78
son as stock character in declamation. See role-playing, Son Sopater, 46
sophia (wisdom), 73. See also city, praise of, for its virtues; declamation, demonstrative, of cities Sophistopolis, 154–156. See also declamation, unreality of sophists, 18–19, 72, 148–149
Sophocles, 135
sōphrosunē (self-control), 73. See also city, praise of, for its virtues; declamation, demonstrative, of cities sorcery, 124
Sparta, 6, 49, 149
springs, 76–78, 80–81. See also water supply
Spurius Cassius, 35, 43, 184n1
Spurius Maelius, 43, 184n1, 185n10
stasis (state of civil unrest), 41–42
stasis theory, 6, 11–12, 114
Statius, 155
statues, 79, 91, 98
status theory. See stasis theory strangulation, punishment by, 130
stellatura, 205n4
stellio, 107. See also lizard; stellionatus stellionatus, 139; definitions of, 107–109, 204n12; modern confusion about, 108, 204n12, 205n4. See also lizards; Ulpian stoa. See colonnade; colonnaded street; columns stock characters in oratory. See role-playing Stoicism, 40
Strabo, 77
Stroux, Johannes, 114, 209n33
stuprum, 120
suasoriae, 3, 17, 227n12. See also declamation, deliberative Suetonius, 39, 51, 56–57, 62–63, 133, 145 suicide: of Cato the Younger, 52–53; as a confession of guilt (or not), 136–138; in declamation, 144, 147; by Porcia, contemplated, 53
Sulla, 11
swindling, financial, 107. See also stellionatus symbouleutic. See declamation, deliberative synkrisis (comparison), 104–105. See also cities, comparison of; declamation, demonstrative, and ranking cities syntaktikos (oration of farewell), 75
Tacitus, 137, 156
talia, 128–131, 218n54. See also reciprocality, and Roman morals Tarquin the Proud, 42–44, 184n1. See also king
Teiros, 80
Tellus, Temple of, 35, 54
temple: 35, 54, 99; in city planning, 81, 91; development of, 70; praise of, 72, 91; robbers of, tyrants as, 187 textbooks. See treatises
The Lord of the Rings, xii
theater: building design of, 67; in city planning, 81, 91; inscription on at Hierapolis, 84–85; of Pompey, 31; Roman stigma at performing in, 8; seating at, 139, 147; value of, 102 Theodosian Code, 206n1; style of, 113, 127, 129 thesis (situation of a city), 72–76, 80–81, 84. See also city, praise of; declamation, demonstrative, of cities theses (philosophical or rhetorical simulated arguments), 45, 179–180n55
Thesprotia, 82
Thessaly, 6
Thrace, 81
Thracian Chersonese, 103
Thucydides, 76–77, 93
Tiber Island, 31–33, 48, 171–172n17
Tiberius (Roman emperor), xii, 61, 126
Timagad, 86
tirocinium fori, 8–9, 162n42
titulus criminis deficit. See nameless crime tomb, 99; violation of, 11
topics, theory of, 114
torture: Caesar’s distaste for, 52–53; in declamation, 52–53, 125, 168n19; fear of, 52–53; of a slave, 125; in treason cases, 129; of women, 52–53, 126
Trajan (Roman emperor), 56
treason, 129
treatises, legal: under the Antonines, 137, 142; of Ulpian, 109 treatises, rhetorical, 9–10, 21, 24, 71, 74, 104–105, 114, 140–141, 155; neglect of city walls in, 91; on rivers and mountains, 78 tribunal, imperial, 148–149
tribune, 38
Trier, 89fig.4, 94
triumvir monetalis, 42
Trojans, 18
trophē (upbringing), 73. See also city, praise of, for its virtues; declamation, demonstrative, of cities Turner, Victor, xii–xi, 188n49
tutor, 3–4, 159n8
Twain, Mark, xi
Twelve Tables, 112, 128
tyrannicide (act and person): assassination of Caesar as, 32–33, 35, 41, 45–46; in declamation, forensic, 14–15, 44–50, 57, 151; escorted down from citadel, 47–48, 52; events following, 47–50, 54–56, 183n70; Greek tradition of, 44, 46; happy consequences of, 55–56; in philosophy, 40–42, 61; proper conduct in, 45, 54–55, 178n46; 179–180n55; qualities of, 47–48; reward for, 45–49, 54, 116, 151, 179n54; speeches after, 49–50, 54–56
tyrant, 46; as abusive term, 149; Caesar as, 32–33, 35; as a criminal, 41; expulsion of, 40, 44; Greek views of, 41, 149; guards of, 52, 55, 62, 183n77; Herodes Atticus as, 149; in philosophy, 40–42, 46–48, 181n61, 181n63, 182–183nn67–68; legal charges of, 149; pressure on ruling class about, 42; Roman emperors as, 56–57, 60–62; supporters of, 41, 48

tyrant, rhetorical: arrogance of, 186n20; avarice of, 186n18; citadel (acropolis or arx), lives in (see citadel); cruelty of, 186n19; in declamation, forensic, 14–15, 44–50, 57, 165n4, 179n53, 181n61, 181n63, 182–183nn67–68; dreads living in fear, 188n43; fearful, 185–186n16; hated and feared, 186n22; happy, 182n67; lustful, 186n21; luxury of, 47; murdered, 47, 182n68; rich and well-born, 47; secluded, 186n17; stock elements of, 47–50, 52–53, 56, 61–62; as temple-robbor, 187n32; tortures, 53, 126, 186n19; weapons, collects to seize tyranny, 47

Tyre, 99

Ulpian (jurist), 111, 139–140; de Officio Proconsulis of, 109; and stellionatus, 108–109, 139; on validity of wills, 137

Ulpius Marcellus (jurist), 135

usufruct, 115

Utica, 52–53

Valentinian (Roman emperor), 23, 121, 127

Valens (Roman emperor), 121, 127

Valerius Maximus, 53

Varro, 78

veneficium, 124–125. See also law, declamatory, on poisoning; law, Roman, on poisoning

Via Nova, 99

Via Sacra, 44

villas, 92

vis, 39, 120, 129–130; vis privata versus vis publica, 211n4

violence, sexual. See raptarum lex; raptus

Vitellius (Roman emperor), 57

Volubilis, 86, 156

voluntas, 133–134. See also law, declamatory, and manumission; law, Roman, and manumission; manumission vulgar law. See jurisprudence, post-classical walls, fortification. See city walls water supply: benefactors of, 78, 83–85; and civic identity, 83–87; competition in, 76–85; increased interest in, 76–83, 194n69; on inscription, 79–80, 83–84; in literature, 76–77; and municipal status, 79–80; in poetry, 77–78; praise of in papyrus, 84; representation of on coinage, 78–79, 83, 85 (see also coinage); as required topic in speeches, 76, 96; rhetorical use of, 74–83; and ruling class, 83–87; in travel guides, ancient, 77–78. See also city, praise of; nymphaea, monumental; springs; rivers

wax tablets, 134

Wilde, Oscar, xi

wills, 126, 128, 133–134. See also law, Roman, and wills witnesses, 11; in parricide case, 133

Xenophon: model of good style, 4

Xerxes, 81

Zeus, 79, 104; (Zeus) Bottiaeus, 80–81