CONTENTS

$Acknowledgments \cdot ix \\ Maps \cdot xiv$

INTRODUCTION	Making a World of States	1
CHAPTER 1	Constitution as Archive: Drafting the Empire, 1848–1860s	28
CHAPTER 2	The Secret Science of Dual Sovereignty: 1867 and After	56
CHAPTER 3	Fictional States: Lands and Nations	103
CHAPTER 4	Pure Theory: Jellinek and Kelsen Reinvent Legal Philosophy	141
CHAPTER 5	What Is a New State? 1919 in the History of the Austro-Hungarian Empire	181
CHAPTER 6	State Birth at the Frontier of Knowledge: Reimagining International Law from Postimperial Vienna	217
CHAPTER 7	Sovereignty in Sequence: Law, Time, and Decolonization	255
CONCLUSION	The Temporal Life of States	283

Notes  $\cdot$  291 Index  $\cdot$  385

INTRODUCTION

Making a World of States

THE PROLIFERATION of internationally recognized, independent nationstates is one of the most striking features of modern history. Their conquest of the world map—and our political imaginaries—may be extensive, but it is also remarkably recent. We only need to travel back a century and a half to grasp the magnitude of this transformation. Wildly heterogeneous political forms populated the world picture of the mid-nineteenth century, stretching from globe-spanning industrialized empires to polycentric sultanates, autonomous enclaves (in Europe as much as elsewhere), and Indigenous communities living according to their own laws. Never before, in fact—at least according to some—had the spectrum of polities ranged so widely.<sup>2</sup> Today, by contrast, we survey a globe almost entirely segmented into sovereign states: modular, clearly demarcated, theoretically equal under international law. The calendrical ledger of the last century kept score of this creeping transmutation of the world: in 1920, the League of Nations counted 42 member states; the United Nations had 60 in 1950, 99 in 1960, and 159 in 1990. Today there are around 200. If the state's capacity, virtue, and significance are ceaselessly in flux and up for debate, especially under the uneven integration of global capitalism, its grip on political life remains tenacious, as the populist nationalism of our own day documents all too well.

What do we know about this epochal change? "The story of how the world came to be so thickly populated with states," David Armitage wrote in 2007, "has hardly begun to be told." International relations scholars, first on the scene, described it as the "expansion of international society"—as though it resembled a door slowly swung open, smoothly, benevolently, to a gradual procession of newcomers. Such framing elided violent wars of national liberation and decolonization, and even the category of empire itself. A new generation of research in diplomatic, international, and legal history is slowly filling in the picture. Scholars have focused on the emergence of international bodies like the League of Nations and the United Nations that facilitated the state-ification of the world, and on the Anglo-American imperial order of which they formed a complex part. With the partial exception of some historians of international law, they have had less to say about its origins outside the Anglo-American world. And we have barely begun to look beneath the surface of international politics to the substratum of assumptions and preconditions that underpinned this juridical transformation. "Statehood" and "sovereignty" lock into some of the most elemental human questions about our communal life: questions about the nature and arrangement of power, and about the ultimate source of legitimate authority. Their history must also be a history of ideas—of arguments and emotions, sense and meaning, aspirations and fears. It involves—as we will see—whole philosophies of law and knowledge, visions of time and history, cosmologies of the politically possible. No part of this conversion was mechanical. Neither "state" nor "sovereignty" can be taken as fixed, pregiven things seized by premade nations.

[2] INTRODUCTION

This book uncovers a crucial piece of the larger international story in a seemingly unlikely place: the Habsburg Empire. As a result, it approaches the empire from an unaccustomed angle. A sprawling polity that dominated the heartlands of Europe for hundreds of years—extending by the nineteenth century from today's northern Italy to western Ukraine, and from southern Poland all the way to Croatia via the Czech lands, Transylvania, Hungary, Slovakia, and Slovenia—the empire lingers like a ghost over the map of Europe. Since its dissolution in 1918, historians of the Habsburg Empire have focused largely on two related issues: first, the reasons for its collapse (with shifting appraisals of its weakness and strength, modernity and backwardness); and second, the nature of the nationalisms that ostensibly brought it down (from ancient ethnic enmity to "national indifference"). This book sets both themes to one side. If it is concerned with Habsburg modernity, it is via its key role as a laboratory for juridical innovation; if it touches on questions of nationalism, it does so because these were spurs to critical questions of sovereignty. It returns to Central European history with a series of more outwardfacing questions about the legal and intellectual history of empire, sovereignty, and statehood. Tying Central European history into a story of the emergence of twentieth-century international order, it also shows just how much international historians can learn from paying closer attention to a region that they have neglected.

This book uses the remaking and interwar unmaking of the Habsburg Empire to track the emergence of a world of states along three central avenues. It begins in the aftermath of the European revolutions of 1848, as the Habsburg Empire was convulsed by decades of constitutional experimentation in the face of rising provincial demands for political rights. I show, first, how these structural experiments directly confronted a set of transitions customarily deemed constitutive of the modern state: from "private" patrimonial rule to abstract "public" authority, and from pluralist, differentiated legal orders to singular, uniform, unified ones. Unlike in France, no revolution had swept away all the old rights and legalities of the ancien régime: the full complex of dynastic, patrimonial law needed to be argued over and converted manually into "modern" equivalents. Unlike in Britain, the Habsburg government had been forced into a written constitution, meaning these adaptations could not unfold backstage, gradually, fuzzily, absentmindedly: the empire's legal order had to be publicly articulated. And, unlike in Germany, the empire's rulers and thinkers could not appeal to the ostensibly organic national unity of das Volk to ground the unity of the state, as the dominant historical school of law did there: the Habsburg lands comprised intermixed peoples speaking some twelve different languages. Combined, these characteristics turned the Habsburg lands into a remarkably explicit workshop for the attempted production of abstract, singular sovereignty out of multinational dynastic empire. The case allows us to eavesdrop on the refashioning of the body of king into the body politic—as live, ever-unfinished history rather than static, retrospective theory—replete with its unresolved problems and inconsistencies, its myths and imaginative leaps, and its many significant consequences.

INTRODUCTION [3]

Second, I recover the place of the Habsburg Empire in that other foundational process underpinning the emergence of a world of states: the demise of (formal) empire and the rise of the nation-state in its wake. We rightly associate this story with the decolonization of Asia and Africa in the decades following World War II. Yet certain parts of the story crystallized at the end of the previous world war, with the dissolution of Habsburg rule in Central Europe. Under the watchful eye of the international community, assembled first at the Paris Peace Conference and then as the League of Nations, a string of newborn sovereign powers appeared in the empire's place, including Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Austria, and Yugoslavia. Important substantive differences distinguish this chapter of imperial dissolution from the one that followed the next world war-not least regarding race and economy. But the end of the Habsburg Empire raised legal questions about the nature of postimperial sovereignty that would remain persistent features of the subsequent global history of decolonization. Here, too, the Habsburg Monarchy occupied a distinct place in the cohort of empires-Ottoman, Russian, and German-that collapsed at the war's end, as the whole of its former territory was converted into independent, postimperial states.<sup>7</sup> Legal conundrums surrounding the messy end of empire and the creation of new states-especially discontinuous sovereignty and the succession of rights, obligations, and territories—were thrown onto the main stage of twentieth-century international order—in one of its most formative moments—largely by the implosion of Habsburg rule.8 The legal stories and theories developed to make sense of that transition would echo in the subsequent decades through South Asia, Africa, and beyond.

[4] INTRODUCTION

Third, legal thinkers from this corner of the world exercised a radically outsized influence on the evolution of modern legal thought in general and theories of the state in particular. To a startling degree, the ideas that shape discourses about sovereignty to this day were born in the Habsburg lands in the decades before and after the empire's collapse. A state, according to international law's standard codification, comprises four things: an effective government, a clearly defined territory, a stable population, and the capacity to enter into relations with other states. The original architect of this (then tripartite) test was Georg Jellinek (1851–1911), son of Vienna's most famous rabbi. Across a prolific career—which culminated in a chair in Heidelberg, where he was a close interlocutor of Max Weber after anti-Semitism drove him from Vienna—Jellinek forged many of the disciplinary building blocks of public and international law.<sup>10</sup> He also inaugurated a methodological revolution that would bear spectacular fruit in the work of his student Hans Kelsen (1881-1973). One of the twentieth century's most important legal philosophers, Kelsen was also a product of the Habsburg experience. He studied when the empire was at its apogee and taught at the University of Vienna as it came crashing down. He masterminded Austria's postwar constitution and served as judge on its constitutional court before anti-Semitism caught up with him, too. The political storms of interwar Europe tossed him first to Cologne—and a legendary confrontation with Nazi jurist Carl Schmitt-then to Geneva, and eventually to Berkeley: he escaped Europe aboard the SS Washington as Hitler's armies marched on Paris. Along the way, he developed an extraordinarily complete philosophy of law. Known as the pure theory of law, its analytical insight, explanatory power, and global influence are matched only by its degree of difficulty and the controversy it generated. Integral to its architecture was a radical new account of what the state was. It explained how law could turn a messy, contradictory material reality into a singular, unified legal entity, and it recast the relationship between sovereignty and international law. Like so many of his legendary Viennese contemporaries and interlocutors— Sigmund Freud among them—Kelsen sought a total theory, one that could make sense of the whole. If the logical astringency and formalism of the pure theory is now foreign to us, so is its staggering intellectual ambition.

This book explains those ideas and their significance and shows why it was not an accident that they emerged in the Habsburg lands in Germanlanguage jurisprudence.<sup>11</sup> The empire became such a hothouse of legal innovation—in both academic theory and constitutional practice—precisely because existing theories could not make sense of it. To confront questions of state and sovereignty in this intricately layered, prodigiously complex empire was to confront the radical limits of legal concepts and to be propelled toward new ones. It might be ironic that an empire saturated with historical rights and traditional law birthed the most strident apostles of legal modernism, but it is not inexplicable. On the contrary. This book shows how orders of thought evolved in dynamic tension with orders of rule, and why innovation and "anachronism" proved such intimate associates rather than each other's opposites. With imperial politics hamstrung by constitutional conflict, law and lawyers wielded an authority and significance in public life that might surprise us today. This standing persisted well into the 1920s, that heady period of state founding and constitution writing in which "the jurist was king." 12 If this book places a spotlight on Jellinek and Kelsen-both mainstays of law school histories and textbooks, but conspicuously neglected by historians—it also offers a broader contextual explanation for the many other thinkers from the Habsburg Empire who shaped twentieth-century legal history, including Eugen Ehrlich, a pioneering scholar of legal pluralism, and Hersch Lauterpacht, a giant of midcentury international law.<sup>13</sup> Even in this milieu, Jellinek and Kelsen stand out not just because of their fame and influence. Plugged into the main philosophical currents of the age, they shared an acute methodological self-consciousness that opens our eyes to law's place in the broader history of knowledge and epistemology. We come to understand how the challenge of making sense of statehood and sovereignty drove that history forward.

INTRODUCTION [5]

Together, these three strands—the empire's constitutional challenges, its international dissolution, and the thinkers who grappled with both—reveal a hidden story about the relationship between sovereignty and time. Foundational early modern political and legal theories of sovereignty had asserted the necessity of the state's juridical immortality. Unless the state persisted as an unchanging legal entity despite the death of a monarch or the fall of a government, it could not guarantee the intergenerational continuity of public order, rights, and duties. Some called it the doctrine of the king's "two bodies": one fleshed and mortal, the other understood as abstract and perpetual. The state's juridical agelessness—the stable continuity of its legal self within the ceaseless flow of time—remains a crucial enabling fiction for our systems of law. But that legal fiction came under extraordinary pressure in the Habsburg lands. Constitutional jurisprudence grappled with whether the empire's constituent polities like Hungary and Bohemia were still-living states, or whether their legal life had been extinguished by centuries of imperial rule; one wondered, too, about the continuity of the empire's own legal personality. The problem of how states endured and how they expired only became more charged and consequential when the empire collapsed, and representatives of the "new" states argued that, legally, they were resurrected versions of their preimperial selves. The many lives and purported deaths of these Central European states expose the visions of time and history built into sovereignty's structure. In so doing, they shed new light on the "long century of modern statehood" that, as Charles Maier has argued, began around 1850 and so integrally shaped political modernity.14

[6] INTRODUCTION

A Many-Bodied Problem

In 1882, Georg Jellinek—then a young adjunct lecturer at the University of Vienna angling for a permanent job—opened his new book with a provocative observation. All the major theorists of sovereignty, whether Hobbes or Bodin or Rousseau, placed the singularity of sovereignty—the notion of a single, supreme, undivided power—at the core of their definitions. Their theories, he claimed, could not make sense of sovereignty in Central Europe. Across the whole German-speaking domain—whether one looked at his home country, Austria-Hungary, or Germany or Switzerland—the "life course" of states was not leading to unitary forms. Instead, one saw different sorts of compound polities: states joined and bundled together, marked by varieties of amalgamation or disaggregation.

This discrepancy between the dominant theories and regional realities had dire consequences, he argued. Scholars manhandled such polities into these ill-fitting frames by interpreting them as "incomplete" realizations of the norm—a "transitional phase of states in a process of unification or deunification"—and thus provisional by definition. Or they described them as "irregular" formations that were, ultimately, "juridically incomprehensible." Labels like "provisional" or "irregular" rendered them irrelevant for doctrine, so the classical definitions marched on, untroubled by the chasm between states in theory and states in fact. Scholarship suffered; the consequences for politics proved no less lamentable. These conceptions had penetrated so deeply that they structured political objectives and debate, sending state makers scurrying off to "correct" their deviant polities. "With the interpretation of a state formation as an irregular one," Jellinek observed, "politics is immediately given the task of clearing away the irregularity." The dominant model had turned conglomerate states into problems that needed to be solved.

Jellinek offered his diagnosis: all these thinkers came from England and France. They reasoned from Western European experiences and presumed them universal norms. But what if the theory—not the "irregular" state—was to blame for the resulting incongruity? Why could some sorts of states generate models and be abstracted into theories, and not others? What might happen if one instead theorized from here, if one devised conceptions of sovereignty at home in this more complex world? Jellinek himself sensed the potential: scanning across a world of tangled empires, he concluded that nonsingular, conglomerate sovereignty in fact represented the global norm. If legal theory could find the right concepts to capture it, it might just unlock the secrets of sovereignty all around the world. <sup>16</sup>

The Habsburg Empire was a time capsule of European history in which different phases of state formation remained alive in the present. Its formal legal architecture preserved the logic of its medieval and early modern formation through a series of dynastic unions. On paper, it remained a concatenation of myriad distinct polities. In the era of enlightened absolutism, this legal structure had been overlaid (but not dissolved) with robust organs of centralized government, based in Vienna. The nineteenth century added yet another layer, as national movements emerged among the empire's dozen or so language communities and demanded a place of some sort in the empire's political architecture. The empire was many versions of itself at once, a layer cake of sovereign history. What was a state? Here was the place to find out. Or, at least—to ask.

INTRODUCTION [7]

Of course, all political orders contain inconsistencies and curiosities, traces of past political struggles and half-abandoned systems of thought. What turned this bricolage into an acute problem for politics and for thought was the revolutions of 1848. Yes, the empire survived the crisis—but only just, and only with a major concession. The emperor gave in to the liberals and nationalists barricading the burning streets and consented to an imperial constitution, that is, a constitution in the "modern" sense: a single written document, a systematic codification. Here a different sort of strife began. What is the first thing a constitution requires? It requires a legal description of the polity in question—of the name and nature of its component parts, the hierarchy and relationship of jurisdictions, the basis and logic of powers. In the Habsburg lands, no element of that description proved uncontroversial. The project of writing down, or "writing up," the empire into a single document left all the conceptual problems exposed to the cold light of day. Or, rather, it records for us the way "modern" law produced sovereign plurality as a problem.

When one tried to square the empire with the category "state," numerous plausible interpretations emerged, all of them contradictory. Only two things were certain, reflected one law professor. First, it truly was a monarchy. Second, it was "not a simple, unified polity but rather a plural, compound one." "Everything else," he wrote, "is doubtful or at least contested, in particular: how many states does it consist of? what are they called? what is their legal relationship to one another? do they together form a state-of-states [Staatenstaat] or a federal state [Bundesstaat]? or is their union to be considered merely as a state confederation [Staatenbund], so that together they don't form a state at all, but rather merely hang together in international law?"<sup>17</sup> Was the Habsburg Monarchy one state, two states, three states, four? In recent decades, a stream of important scholarship by Tara Zahra, Pieter Judson, Kate Brown, and others has shown how Central and Eastern Europe was gradually sorted into national communities out of a welter of more fluid, overlapping identities. <sup>18</sup> But this is not true only of nations: it had to be sorted into states, too.

How could the sovereign situation be so opaque? The answer lies in the nature of the empire's original legal stitching. It came into being through a series of dynastic "personal unions" in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, in which various small polities were united through the body of a shared monarch only. The monarch acquired an additional title or ruling identity—Herrscherpersönlichkeit—so that the Archduke of Austria, the king of Bohemia, the Margravate of Moravia, and the king of Hungary (and so on) were one and the same physical person. But the various polities otherwise retained independent legal identities and broad autonomy, with their own provincial diets and customary laws. The most significant of these unions occurred in 1526, when a skillfully knotted net of dynastic marriages drew the crowns of Bohemia and Hungary into Habsburg hands, dramatically enlarging the latter's hitherto modest alpine holdings. Composite monarchies (as historians would later call them) were entirely unremarkable in medieval and early modern Europe. 19 But by the mid-nineteenth century, such promiscuous, sovereign-sharing state formations had lost their self-evidence: they no longer made sense in the categories and worldview of nineteenthcentury European legal science and government, which saw states as clearly demarcated, singular things and distinguished sharply between domestic and international law.<sup>20</sup> A many-crowned emperor-king, as a literal embodiment of the distinctness and the unity of multiple polities, may have been natural within the frame of medieval and early modern statecraft, but how should that dynastic cosmology be transcribed into coherent, workable, respectable legal form in 1848, or 1867, or 1908? Did the king of Bohemia, for example, have international standing and international legal personality? If not—if, internationally, he disappeared into his alter ego, the emperor of Austria then did the emperor step in and out of international law, and in and out of constitutional law, as he symbolically took off the imperial crown and put on a royal one?

[8] INTRODUCTION

The many crowns were only the most eye-catching imprints of a very different legal world. The original dynastic unions reflected a horizon of practices and imaginaries with none of the same coordinates as "modern" law. This patrimonial understanding of rule and right knew no fundamental distinction between "public" and "private," between (personal) property and (state) territory. Emperors and princes, lords and vassals, landowners and peasant laborers were all bound together in reciprocal and cascading bonds, privileges, and responsibilities, in which "juridical principles of 'scalar' or conditional property" had their correlate in "parcellized sovereignty."21 Annunciated and renewed through oaths, coronations, and other rituals, these relationships were personal, based on tradition, and far from equal or uniform. Rule often took the shape of cyclic consensual agreements between monarchs and estates (i.e., "groups of persons who enjoyed the same rights, shared the same political obligations, and pursued their common interests in an organized manner"), often convened in territorial assemblies and diets.<sup>22</sup> Law, economy, and society were not distinct domains. Noble lords and large landowners administered justice and collected taxes; there was no unmediated relationship between monarchs and subjects. "Constitutions" were not written but physically enacted and performed; law was not abstract or homogeneous.<sup>23</sup> And, crucially, there was no expectation that law and sovereignty be logically consistent or "rational." Powers and jurisdiction did not follow clear, sequential, logical chains of derivation; like rights and norms, they could overlap, coexist, cross, contradict, and reverse. Take, for example, Charles the Bold, the ambitious fifteenth-century Duke of Burgundy, who could be the vassal of the French king in some of his lands and of the (Habsburg) Holy Roman Emperor in others; while, in others still, the French king was his vassal. If we cannot help but understand descriptions like "irrational" or "incoherent" in unambiguously pejorative terms, it is a sign of the modern valuations we all too easily take as given, as well as the inaptitude of our vocabulary for the phenomena in question.

INTRODUCTION [9]

Across the early modern period, Habsburg statecraft gradually moved out of this world. The dynasty won decisive victories over the estates that reduced the latter's power and slowly condensed governing prerogatives in Vienna, like the Battle of the White Mountain (1620) that fatally undercut the Bohemian nobility. Fundamental laws from 1713 and 1723, known as the Pragmatic Sanction, asserted the inseparability of the Habsburg lands and established a common law of succession operative across them all. The late eighteenth century witnessed the most dramatic transformation. Through wide-ranging administrative and fiscal reforms at the vanguard of European developments, Maria Theresa and her son Joseph II drew significant power away from various mediatory corporations and structures like the church and the nobility. Estate owners largely lost control of taxation and peasant labor; tariff regimes were consolidated, territories mapped, and populations counted; and new, robust organs of central government became a presence felt in the lives of ordinary people. <sup>26</sup>

Yet the structures, forms, and imaginaries of this older, traditional legal world did not simply wither away under the "light" of absolutism and the self-consciously modern project of centralization. Habsburg rule still differed significantly across their lands, from Tyrol to Croatia, Moravia to Galicia, bearing the marks of each one's particular (legal) history. Nowhere was this more true than in Hungary, where the nobility had resisted almost all incursions and staunchly defended its traditional rights, laws, and privileges. No one really spoke of a Habsburg "state" prior to the early nineteenth century.<sup>27</sup> After all, until that point, the Habsburgs also wore the crown of the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation: a loose, patchwork polity that sprawled across the thick middle of the continent, and which encompassed some of the Habsburg hereditary lands, but not all, with Hungary and Croatia lying beyond its borders. Only in 1804, in response to Napoleon's declaration of himself as emperor of the French, and with the dissolution of the Holy Roman Empire on the horizon, did Francis I create a comparable title-emperor of Austria-that pertained to all his "own" lands—that is, lands he presided over not as Holy Roman Emperor but as king and archduke and all his myriad other selves.<sup>28</sup>

[10] INTRODUCTION

Law's Truth under Pressure

When the 1848 revolutions propelled the project of an imperial constitution to the center of political life, it immediately confronted a many-sided impasse. At the level of actual administration, the monarchy functioned as a relatively centralized state. Yet, legally, an older landscape of sovereignty persisted. Traditional rights, privileges, and obligations had in fact been continually reaffirmed through coronations and other rituals of dynastic-aristocratic rule. They all lay waiting, half lapsed but still technically legitimate, still "on the books," when representatives from across the empire gathered in a new constituent assembly tasked with thrashing out an imperial constitution. Delegates from the various kingdoms and lands were quick to insist that their traditional rights were still live, valid law, now to be enshrined in the new constitution. The first impasse, then, involved an eerie disjuncture between the factual-material reality of imperial rule—manifest in a centralized, "modern" state—and its formal legal architecture, which preserved a collage of disparate medieval and early modern polities. What did it mean if law said one thing but a world of material "facts" said something else? Had the Kingdom of Bohemia become a mere "fantasy," as one parliamentary delegate contended?<sup>29</sup> Either way, how could one tell? Did law have its own "reality" or truth, distinct from other sorts? How should these different genres of the real be stacked against one another?

Questions of constitutional order thus rapidly spiraled into questions about the nature of legal truth and knowledge. There was an inexorable pull toward an epistemological register: again and again, protagonists needed to make arguments about the relationship between the real and the fictional, the lapsed and the living, form and content, law and fact. That pull only gathered strength through the constitutional reconfigurations of 1849, 1860, 1861, and 1867 and the vociferous constitutional debate that continued unabated for the remainder of the empire's existence. In shifting iterations, assessments of the nature of imperial sovereignty, its underlying logic as well as its plurality or singularity, turned on accounts of the legal real.

Small wonder that as a new scholarly field emerged over the same period, it too gravitated toward problems of method and epistemology. When revolution broke out across the Danube Monarchy in 1848, the empire's constitutional law and history were not part of university curricula; there were no professorships or standard works. That lacuna makes subsequent developments all the more striking. By the early twentieth century, the empire's universities were hothouses of research in public law. The history and theory of constitutional law emerged alongside the practical task of constitutionalization. Scholars ran into the same problems as politicians. To grapple with the state "from here" was to grapple with the nature of law itself. It drove some to a radical new empiricism. Eugen Ehrlich (1862–1922), for example—a pioneering legal sociologist writing from rural, polyethnic Bukovina on the easternmost edge of the empire—was clear that the notion of a singular, encompassing state legal order could explain little about the way law actually functioned amid this tangle of traditions and practices. He developed his influential notion of "living law" from the "direct observation of life." 30 But the situation drove others in the opposite direction, pushing them toward a radical new abstraction. Faced with the jurisdictional chaos of the empire, Hans Kelsen concluded that one could only establish the coherence of sovereignty, and the formal unity of the state, by definitively cleaving off law as a material, empirical fact—messy, plural, riddled with inconsistencies—from law as a formal, abstract norm. The state's unity simply could not be established in an empirical fashion: it existed as a normative proposition only. Kelsen salvaged (or, rather, created) a logical, singular sovereignty, but only by tracking back to the deep foundations of knowing and judging, and only by abandoning the empirical world. Seen from here, it seemed, a theory of sovereignty must be a theory of knowledge, too. Across both the public sphere and the academy, arguments about what imperial sovereignty was or how it worked became questions of how one could tell in the first place.

INTRODUCTION [11]

Sleeping States

A disjuncture between sorts of truth was not the only impasse confronted by the constitutional project. When representatives of the kingdoms and lands invoked their traditional rights and prerogatives, looking to have them recognized in the new constitutional order(s), they were resummoning that older legal world into one that had changed materially and conceptually. They needed to convert the forms of medieval and early modern sociopolitical-legal life into "law" recognizable as such in the nineteenth century and adapted to the needs of modern constitutionalism. They scouted for terminology and ideas that could digest dynastic-feudal legal formations into those of "modern" statecraft. Their work allows us to watch a range of figures suturing the framework of modern sovereignty out of the material of orders past.

In this context, invocations of "historical rights" assumed a new importance. <sup>31</sup> The traditional rights and privileges of (say) Bohemian or Hungarian elites, assembled as estates in the Bohemian or Hungarian diets, were spheres of noble autonomy from princely power. They had been cyclically reaffirmed through rituals like coronations in which the monarch pledged to uphold them. Now, these traditional prerogatives were gradually reinterpreted as a form of historical Staatsrecht—that is, a body of public law governing a state. Staatsrecht has no easy English equivalent. More specific than "public law" and more general than "constitutional law" (though often used as a loose synonym for the latter), it is the law that regulates the fundamental legitimacy and nature of the state. To assert the ongoing force of one's historical Staatsrecht was to make a claim about the survival of old rights and also about the nature of the entity that possessed them. <sup>32</sup> Put succinctly, the "historical rights" of the estates became the historical rights of states. Traditional feudal prerogatives became the public law and constitution of these former polities. The Habsburg acquisition of the Holy Crown of Saint Stephen or the Crown of Saint Wenceslas in the early sixteenth century became Hungary's and Bohemia's respective loss of sovereignty, a sovereignty they had never formally renounced. "Historical rights" came to signal a genre of latent or suspended sovereignty, still normatively valid and simply awaiting renewal. To dismiss such claims as anachronisms or unserious fantasies is to overlook the fact that the anachronisms are themselves a signal feature of the story.<sup>33</sup> For both political actors and scholars, making sense of the empire's legal order entailed a filtering of historical formations through the paradigms of the present—a search for equivalents or matches between then and now. History, too, was "codified" into categories of state and sovereignty. These "category mistakes" mark the collision of different cosmologies of rule.

[12] INTRODUCTION

Arguments about imperial order thus contained a series of epochal transformations. They document the conceptual labor, the difficulties, and the legacies of spinning the rights of estates into the rights of states, property into territory, "private" into "public," a kaleidoscope of jurisdictions into homogeneous legal space, embodied law into abstraction, divine right into positive law and "nonderived" power. Just as "the economy," in Karl Polanyi's famous formulation, needed to become "disembedded" from a more reciprocal, integrated social order, so too did the law require active fashioning into a self-contained, coherent object. <sup>34</sup> As the dynastic state par excellence, the Habsburg Empire affords special visibility to the (imperfect) depersonalization of rights and rule underpinning the historical construction of public power. If there is ever-new attention to the erosion of public prerogatives and the privatization of the state in our own age, this history reminds us how recent and how fragile that construction is. <sup>35</sup>

In the decades after 1848, the Habsburg Empire tried out different versions of that translation in a series of constitutional orders. After a skittish cycle of short-lived constitutions between 1848 and 1851, Emperor Francis Joseph reinstated absolutism for the best part of a decade. When new fundamental laws in 1860 and 1861 reintroduced constitutional rule, the historic kingdoms and lands were affirmed as the basis of imperial order and granted robust autonomy, including wide lawmaking jurisdiction and administrative organs that ran parallel to imperial ones in an unusual dual-track structure. The most dramatic experiment, though, unfolded through the Ausgleich, or Settlement, of 1867, which transformed the empire into two, separate, and equally sovereign halves: Hungary, on one side, and the remaining "Austrian" lands, on the other. It converted the logic of composite monarchy into a new bifurcated sovereignty—a hyphenated state formation called the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Had sovereignty been doubled, or divided? How could a state be two, and somehow also always one? "The Dualist theory," historian R. W. Seton-Watson later quipped, "is almost as theological as the doctrine of the Trinity."36

INTRODUCTION [13]

If some class it as the last gasp of composite monarchy, the 1867 Settlement was for that reason (and not despite it) something genuinely experimental. That would composite monarchy look like updated for the nineteenth-century present—a sovereignty that was aggregated and disaggregated, plural and singular at the same time? The unity, once resident exclusively in the king's body, now resided in three "common" ministries: one for war, another for foreign affairs, and a third for the finances for war and foreign affairs—that is, exclusively the outward-facing dimensions of sovereignty. Otherwise Hungary and Cisleithania, as the nameless other imperial half was sometimes known, sonstituted separate states, with their own legislatures, their own territories, and even their own citizenship. In the subsequent unrelenting controversy over this dual structure, Hungarian politicians went so far as to claim that no overarching, "third" state—no empire—existed at all. Viennese jurists found it maddeningly hard to prove otherwise.

How could one prove a state existed? Where, or in what, did its "reality" reside? The right test and criteria preoccupied university seminars and parliamentary committees alike. The dual monarchy could hardly be a state, Hungarian politicians like Albert Apponyi (1846-1933) asserted, if it had no legislature or citizenship of its own. But if the empire arguably lacked the requisite features, its component polities certainly did, too. This drove political actors from Bohemia and Hungary to particular arguments about why and how their polities still counted as (quasi-sovereign) states despite the material reality of a relatively centralized empire. Valid law, they argued, could not be overridden by mere "facts." Polities could persist as legal norms-pieces of suspended legitimacy awaiting renewed recognition and the restoration of full factual life. "For centuries, Hungary has led a double existence: one in reality, another in its laws," wrote the historian Louis Eisenmann in a classic 1904 study. These laws had preserved the "legal fiction of its sovereignty. It is . . . this legal fiction which the laws of 1867 have turned into a reality." In some senses, these contentions echoed and extended older arguments about the Holy Roman Empire as a mere shadow or legal fiction. 40 Only the problem of sovereignty's infirm reality now unfolded, as we will see, in a very different political and philosophical context: a late modern world of radically expanded state prerogatives; of a rapacious European imperialism trading on ideologies of stadial, graded sovereignty; of the triumph of positivist knowledge; and of intense new scholarly attention, under the sign of neo-Kantianism, to problems of the real and the true.

Sorting Self and Globe: Austria-Hungary in a World of Empires

Through the attempt to convert premodern pluralisms into modern ones, Habsburg constitutional law generated forms of quasi sovereignty. Clearly, these differed significantly from the quasi sovereignties and legal pluralisms produced by European imperialism in Africa, Asia, and the Middle East.<sup>41</sup> For one, their underlying logic was temporal more than spatial: they turned on the survival of rights, law, jurisdictions through time rather than the extension of rights, law, and jurisdiction through space—on history more than geography. 42 At the same time, the constitutional reformulation of the Habsburg Empire formed part of a much broader story of sovereign self-consciousness and imperial codification. A number of material and philosophical developments combined to make sovereignty a keyword of the nineteenth century. The dramatic extension of European imperialism across the globe both relied on and produced sovereignty as a central legitimating device: notions of perfect or complete European sovereignty took shape through a constitutive contrast to a nonsovereign (or imperfectly sovereign) non-European other, by definition available for conquest, occupation, and exploitation. 43 A thickening self-consciousness about sovereign status and interimperial competition, as well as the increasing complexity of imperial rule and desire for its rationalization, spurred a range of codification projects. 44 These imperatives did not affect only the blue water empires. On the contrary: with noteworthy simultaneity in the 1860s, projects of constitutional reorganization and codification seized not only the Habsburg Empire but also the Ottoman, Russian, and Japanese Empires. All these empirestates, located to a greater or lesser degree on the ambiguous peripheries of the European imperial system and "international community," felt similar pressures toward modernization, rationalization, and centralization—pressures to codify, articulate, and assert their sovereignty in mutually recognizable ways. 45

[14] INTRODUCTION

Philosophical changes, too—and not just geopolitical ones—contributed to sovereignty's swollen nineteenth-century importance. The decline of natural law and divine right and the hydraulic rise of (legal) positivism recast the state—rather than nature, or reason, or God—as the source of law. Many jurists sought to set their discipline on new scientific, objective, empirical foundations by rejecting any metaphysical grounding and recognizing only state-made, man-made, positive law as law. Domestically, this shift heightened the significance of identifying the precise location of sovereignty and ensuring its singularity. Without recourse to a higher, transcendental principle or framework, only that singularity—as origin and end point of authority and legitimacy—could ground the unity of the legal order and prevent conflicts of law. Internationally, meanwhile, the shift went hand in hand with the rise of modern international law as a distinct discipline in the nineteenth century. Indeed, the pivot to positivism underpinned the newly sharp divide between domestic and international law, between the insides and outsides of a state, no longer both subsumed within an encompassing natural or divine order. International law was now understood as law made by sovereign states: dependent on their consent, it could not precede or exceed them. Nineteenth-century jurists, in Antony Anghie's words, "sought to reconstruct the entire system of international law as a creation of sovereign will."46

INTRODUCTION [15]

Sovereignty became, in short, the lens for new maps of the world—a prism for understanding, demarcating, and comparing self and other, and for constituting, analyzing, and regulating the interstate community. In their (re)articulations of Habsburg sovereignty, Central European actors located themselves on these new world maps, coding themselves into global typologies of sovereignty. Unsatisfied with the available terminology, Georg Jellinek coined the concept of "state fragments" (Staatsfragmente) to capture an "inbetween level" between "state" and "province." Some political formations, he argued, were subordinated under a state government but not entirely "merged" with that state: "not states themselves," they presented "the rudiments of a state." This genre of quasi sovereignty captured the ambiguous status of the Austrian lands, which preserved key markers of statehood like their own, nonderived lawmaking power. It also arranged the international landscape along unfamiliar lines, grouping the Austrian lands together with the settler colonies of Australia and Canada, which likewise possessed state organs though not full independence.<sup>47</sup> The idiosyncrasies of Habsburg sovereignty rendered it a compelling provocation for new global taxonomies of this sort. The desire to "box states into species and types like one does with plants and animals," remarked one skeptical jurist, made Austria-Hungary an "adored object of such academic speculation."48

To dwell on the peculiarity and plurality of Habsburg sovereignty might seem to fly in the face of decades of Central European historiography. For at least a generation, historians have worked to overturn earlier portrayals of the Habsburg Empire as an "anachronism" on the European stage—a backward, rickety medieval relic destined to collapse. The older portrayals had their roots in polemical nationalist narratives from the interwar period that sought to shore up the legitimacy of the successor states by depicting the empire as an oppressive "prison of nationalities." In rejecting this blinkered nationalist historiography, scholars have instead asserted the fundamental modernity and robustness of the empire, tellingly taken to involve its centralization, unity, functionality, and liberalism. Thanks to this pathbreaking research, we build today from a portrait of a dynamic, participatory, progressive, and creatively multinational polity.<sup>49</sup> At the same time, in affirming the symbiotic connection between modernity, centralization, progress, and unity (rather than studying it as a historically situated, normative viewpoint), and in emphasizing the ways the Habsburg Empire resembled Western European states, this historiography has foreclosed an exploration of the empire's legal disaggregation as a point of connection to larger imperial and international histories. The perspectives and questions of global history bring new interpretive oxygen to continental European history. After all, rather than an automatic sign of fragility or reason for shame, legally differentiated rule remained the global norm.<sup>50</sup>

Moreover, a singular, linear timeline of modernity proves ill-equipped to capture the sovereign transformations at the heart of this book. As I have suggested, the "survival" of old rights and legal formations required great creativity: we can understand the persistence of historical rights and debates about residual sovereignty as movement as much as stasis. <sup>51</sup> Persistence is no simple phenomenon. The German historian Reinhart Koselleck was fascinated by the longer, elongated durations of legal history: as he showed in his habilitation on Prussia, the survival or stasis of law could become a dynamic historical force as it fell out of step with changing social needs and began producing new injustices, triggering new reforms and social movements. <sup>52</sup> History is not propelled exclusively by the arrival of "new" phenomena, though historians' eyes tend to be drawn there, as Arno Mayer observed. <sup>53</sup>

[16] INTRODUCTION

Just like many other dimensions of the fabled cultural and intellectual ferment of the late Habsburg Empire, it is precisely the hybridity of legal forms and ideas-eclectic and volatile compounds of the "archaic" and the hypermodern, liberal and illiberal, rational and sensual—that characterizes their power, interest, and significance.<sup>54</sup> Nothing about the empire's legal nature was self-evident, which conversely made so much possible or thinkable. One experimented with sovereignties stacked vertically and with dual sovereignty joined horizontally, with rights guarantees and curias for language groups and with nonterritorial jurisdictions. Small wonder this gallery of experiments echoed and traveled, especially for those dissatisfied with the unitary state and restlessly searching for wider horizons of sovereign possibility. Austro-Marxist proposals for the legal personality of national communities had afterlives in the Soviet Union as well as the League of Nations' interwar minorities regime and, later, the political theory of multiculturalism.<sup>55</sup> Habsburg layered sovereignty and dual-track administration shaped the thought of Austrian economists like Ludwig von Mises and Friedrich von Hayek, who transposed that schema upward when they conceived of international economic governance as a stratum lying atop and bracketed from state sovereignty.<sup>56</sup> The model of the 1867 Settlement, in which two states might be fully sovereign and independent yet still looped together, was discussed by Ottoman intellectuals as a model for Egypt, by Irish nationalists as a template for their autonomy, and on the subcontinent as the partition of India and Pakistan loomed.<sup>57</sup> Today, in the wake of new chaotic jurisdictional tangles in business and internet law, lawyers have resurrected the "living law" of Eugen Ehrlich, tellingly figured under the sign "Global Bukovina" in a nod to the far eastern reaches of the Habsburg Empire that he called home.<sup>58</sup> And the Habsburg Empire itself is now routinely invoked as a precedent, model, or warning for the European Union.<sup>59</sup>

If this book sets aside a simple modernity-backwardness dichotomy, it also offers an altered perspective on that other major theme of Central European historiography, namely, nationalism. To turn from the history of ethnic-linguistic nations to that of states is not to discount the significance of rich national histories—on the contrary. But if we now know so much about the former, the history of Habsburg sovereignty remains comparatively neglected. <sup>60</sup>

INTRODUCTION [17]

Sovereignty, as James Sheehan argued memorably, is not a thing but a problem and a practice, a set of claims and counterclaims "made by those seeking and wielding power, claims about the superiority and autonomy of their authority." Nationalists entered into this political arena, presenting one competing vision of imperial order, but they largely failed to leave an imprint on the empire's legal structure. Despite some creative national settlements at the regional level in the last two decades of Habsburg rule, the empire remained a union of historical kingdoms and lands, not a federation of nations. These historical lands were not national entities and did not correspond to patterns of ethnolinguistic settlement. Bohemia comprised both Czech and German speakers, while Magyar speakers scarcely made out a majority in the Kingdom of Hungary, sharing space with (those who came to identify as) Slovaks, Ruthenians, Slovenes, Germans, Ukrainians, Romanians, Croats, and Serbs.

The distinction between lands and nations was fundamental to Habsburg constitutional debate and to Central and Eastern European political discourse more broadly. The historic lands—long-standing legal-political entities with a history of independence-stood in stark opposition to communities defined by common ethnicity and/or language. Nationalism in that ethnic-linguistic sense was emerging as a framework for identity and politics only over the course of the nineteenth century. 62 The significance of these contrasts transgressed political divides. Within the framework of Habsburg constitutional debate, the rights of the lands stemmed from old aristocratic privileges and estates-based law and carried that traditional-conservative imprint. But the juxtaposition of peoples who had "a history" of their own with "nonhistoric peoples" who ostensibly did not also featured in the writings of Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, among many others. Amid the heat of the 1848 revolutions, Engels lambasted the "Southern Slavs" of the Habsburg Empire as "ethnographic relics" and "nothing but the residual fragments of peoples."63 "Peoples which have never had a history of their own, which from the time when they achieved the first, most elementary stage of civilization already came under foreign sway," he wrote in 1849, "are not viable and will never be able to achieve any kind of independence."64 (Half a century later, it was the Austro-Marxists who brokered a reconciliation between the Marxist tradition and ethnic nationalism.)<sup>65</sup> Contorted echoes of this way of categorizing the region's peoples, and judging their present rights, lingers into the twenty-first century, as we see in Vladimir Putin's assertions about the historical baselessness of Ukrainian sovereignty.66

This book tracks a conversation about the distribution of sovereignty between the lands and the empire, though chapter 3 also treats attempts to fashion ethnic nations into legal entities that could bear rights in the imperial constitutional structure. Its subject is an empire-scale contest over sovereignty that unfolded in German. Other important "internal" discussions in Czech and Hungarian and the empire's many other languages have been analyzed within particular national histories. My interest lies in arguments directed to the imperial government or that aimed to alter the imperial structure: rights claims that sought constitutional recognition and were articulated in German for that reason. Drawing the picture together in this way allows us to see how the imperial context shaped the nature of those claims, which often employed the same styles of historical-legal reasoning. It also allows us to see how nationalism tried to find its place within an existing landscape of legal ideas and institutions.

[18] INTRODUCTION

1919 in the History of the Austro-Hungarian Empire

The difficulties of distinguishing juridically alive states from juridically dead ones acquired new significance when the empire collapsed in 1918, exhausted from four long years of total war. The same questions of the survival, continuity, and identity of states now lurched dramatically to the center of international politics. The year 1918 was once portrayed as a Central European year zero: "Austria-Hungary sued for Peace and then vanished from history," in Margaret MacMillan's nutshell.<sup>67</sup> In this view, the dissolved Habsburg Monarchy became a blank terrain for a new order of nation-states.<sup>68</sup> This emplotment owes much to the self-presentation of nationalist state makers, who were keen to assert the naturalness of their liberation from an ostensibly unnatural imperial "prison." Tracing the history of states rather than nations reminds us just how convulsive and complicated this transition was. The wholesale rupture of sovereignty meant a rupture of the legal order itself. It raised challenging questions about the transfer of rights and obligations from old states to new ones—questions that would become key battlefields in the decolonization struggles that seized the global order after World War II. These questions arrived early to Central Europe, though the stories have not been connected before.<sup>69</sup> This is not to suggest that the transformation of Central Europe in 1918-19 can be meaningfully understood as "decolonization." The postimperial, as Peter Holquist reminds us, is not the same as the postcolonial.<sup>70</sup> Rather, I show how we can trace particular international legal problems raised by the eclipse of Habsburg rule, problems connected to the birth and death of states, along a global trajectory in the second half of the twentieth century.

Looking for ways of managing this crisis of legal legitimacy, representatives of the successor states turned to the languages of legal title they had long honed within the frame of imperial constitutional law. So much of the conceptual work had already been done. The state-ification of the empire had left them well stocked with arguments about the preexisting statehood of many of the empire's component parts. At the Paris Peace Conference and beyond, claim makers redeployed the rhetorical arsenal of imperial constitutional debate on the world stage, arguing for the survival of historic polities and their historical rights through the centuries of imperial rule and out the other side.

INTRODUCTION [19]

Legal concepts and methodologies developed to capture the particularities of imperial sovereignty ironically came to serve as intellectual tools for managing its absence—a way of sorting through the landscape of broken states, making the region legally legible to outsiders, and establishing international standing and legitimacy. The empire had died, but in a strange way, its constitution lived on: an empire turned inside out.<sup>71</sup>

Arguments about slumbering or residual sovereignty moved across the cusp of 1918, along with the evidentiary scaffolds—the configurations of law and fact—that supported them. Repeating old constitutional arguments almost verbatim, Czech submissions to the peace conference explained to the peacemakers that, "theoretically," the Habsburgs had always recognized, "at least implicitly, in their (official) acts, the legal existence of the Czech State and the independence of the Crown of Bohemia, the latter being considered as forming a separate State." Thus, if the Bohemian state no longer existed "practically," it still "existed legally." The state had preserved its "theoretical" existence—its platonic, abstract, juridical life. Composite monarchy was a miraculous technology of state preservation. Neither the old-new Czechoslovak state nor the old-new Hungarian one needed to rely on some general justification for new states loosened from the clutches of empire, or the fraught legal logic of self-determination whereby a new international entity was conjured into being out of nothingness. According to these arguments, they only had to be reactivated, de-archived out of the imperial constitution and reintroduced to the international community. Imperial rule was presented as a mere interregnum, now overturned through reversion to a preimperial status quo.

The ensuing debates over whether Czechoslovakia, Hungary, republican Austria, and Yugoslavia constituted "old" or "new" states had widespread political-legal consequences for both the succession of rights (especially to territory) and debts (especially reparations). Representatives of the new rump Austrian state used imperial constitutional law in the same way, but they used it to argue the opposite proposition: that they were not an old state but in fact a new one. The Allies' draft treaty wanted to make peace with "Austria," but a state of that name had never existed, they explained unblinkingly to the Allies, and certainly did not wage the war. Only the dualist "Austro-Hungarian" Monarchy had the legal capacity for international dealings: "De jure, an 'Austria' has never existed—thus we cannot succeed such [a state] nor represent it here."73 Besides, the Austrian delegation continued, with its territory and population changed unrecognizably, and a revolution in the form of government, on what basis could their small republic be deemed the legal successor of the Habsburg Monarchy? The republic, they insisted, was a new state and could not be automatically saddled with the war debts and obligations of the former empire. The Treaty of Saint-Germain was still drafted as if a continuous Austrian legal identity could be presumed, but, behind the scenes at the conference, the Austrian arguments provoked doubt and consternation.

[20] INTRODUCTION

How could one determine if a state was legally continuous, or if it had died? What was the measure or rule? The heated memoranda war that followed in the back rooms of the peace conference revealed that no one really knew.

In the decades of decolonization that followed World War II, these same sorts of legal stories—about sovereignty suspended and resurrected, about the particular ways sovereignty worked in time—morphed into scripts for international legal politics around the globe. Jurists from India, Indonesia, Algeria, and elsewhere rejected the idea that their states were "new," with its connotations of contingency and conditionality. They too argued that their polities reverted to a sovereignty they had held prior to colonial rule. In the formulation of the prominent Indian jurist Ram Prakash Anand, colonization had "eclipsed rather than extinguished the international legal personality of the colonized countries." With suspended sovereignty now revived, postcolonial states rejoined the international legal community not as juvenile newcomers but as equals.<sup>74</sup>

Edges of the Knowable: States in Time

"Sovereignty" has long functioned as a limit concept. A marker of the highest and the supreme, of final things and first things, the foundation of law and yet above or before the law, sovereignty is "political theology," in Carl Schmitt's famous formulation, covered with the fingerprints of the creator God with whom it was originally associated. To be "nonderived" and thus paramount—to be an original fount of law rather than something delegated from another source—relied on an ultimately mystical origin, a derivation "from nothingness." This moment of suspense," as Jacques Derrida parsed it, "this founding or revolutionary moment of law is, in law, an instance of non-law. But it is also the whole history of law. . . . It is the moment in which the foundation of law remains suspended in the void or over the abyss, suspended by a pure performative act that would not have to answer to or before anyone." By pointing to origins, foundations, and sources, to the "presupposed and a priori," sovereignty represents a threshold not only for law and politics but also for knowledge.

In an age dazzled by the achievements and methodological self-consciousness of the natural sciences, nineteenth-century jurists sought to modernize legal scholarship by setting it on new empirical, "scientific" foundations. Forsaking natural law and divine right in favor of legal positivism, they designated the earthbound, sovereign state as the source of law. Indeed, lawmaking power counted among its constitutive features. In so doing, they ushered in an alternate set of difficulties through the back door. If the state constituted the source of law, then anything behind or before the state became juridically invisible or incomprehensible: to be prior to the state was, by definition, to be prior to the law. The shift to positivism thus meant that there could be no such thing as legal knowledge about the creation of states (or their demise) because law could hardly regulate its own coming into being; it could not be prior to itself, there to witness and regulate its own birth. If law was grounded in the state, then the state's identity, its legal existence, was not something that could be analyzed within that same legal framework. Jellinek referred blankly to the "untenability of all attempts . . . to construe the creation of states juridically." The birth and death of states was thus categorized a matter of fact and not law—made extraneous to the law and placed beyond legal cognition. It marked the vanishing point of positivist legal knowledge. Within positivist legal frameworks, dominant by the late nineteenth century, the state—as the premise of law itself—always already existed.

INTRODUCTION [21]

These formal propositions dovetailed with some much older ideas about the nature of the sovereign state. Integral to its modern incarnation was the notion of juridical immortality. Ernst Kantorowicz famously traced the medieval genealogy of this doctrine in The King's Two Bodies. The state did not just fasten a plurality of people into a singular legal entity: that legal entity remained the same, ageless and unchanging, despite the coming and going of a plurality of persons over time. <sup>80</sup> The idea also lay at the center of Thomas Hobbes's canonical account of the state as a persona ficta. The state, he argued, required an "artificial eternity of life." Unless it was an abstract, undying entity, it could not incur public debt or keep treaty commitments or guarantee many other facets of public order that involved time spans beyond the scale of a single generation. <sup>81</sup> "One reason why states are likely to remain powerful actors in the contemporary world," Quentin Skinner has written more recently, "is that they will outlive us all." <sup>82</sup> Undying and perpetual, states arose, Kelsen reflected a little ruefully in the 1920s, "with the claim to be valid forever." <sup>83</sup>

The end of imperial sovereignty exposed the gaping black hole surrounding the legal birth and death of states. For Central European jurists writing through and after the collapse of the Habsburg Empire, the temporal edges of sovereignty suddenly loomed out of those disciplinary shadows and bore down on the present with an existential urgency. In the early 1920s, Kelsen puzzled that legal scholars possessed endless exhaustive treatments of the state's territorial frontiers and virtually none of its temporal ones. Perhaps because the outer rim of territorial jurisdiction seemed perceptible, tangible (he used the word fühlbar) while any temporal limit seemed completely *im*perceptible, occluded by the doctrine of the state's Ewigkeit—its perpetuity, its eternity. No longer. It was now clear that states existed in time, too, and not only in space.<sup>84</sup> The eclipse of imperial sovereignty sensitized Kelsen and his colleagues to the fiction, the contrivance, of state immortality: the cultivated timelessness of the state's legal order, its insensibility to time, had been violently jolted into the domain of the sensible. They began to fashion states-in-time into an object of legal analysis.

For these jurists, to confront the chronological edges of sovereignty was like staring over the edge of a cliff into a terrifying zone beyond law—a legal void or vacuum completely abhorrent to modern belief in the necessary gaplessness of legal order. Some felt a colonial chill: a chronological gap between sovereignties, in the revealing analogy of Kelsen student Josef Kunz, threatened to leave Austria momentarily in the same international legal position as "so-called 'savages.'" <sup>85</sup> Kelsen and his circle developed a number of philosophical strategies to seal over this abyss. Strikingly, it was the conceptual innovations they had developed in response to the impasse of Habsburg sovereign plurality that now suggested ways of overcoming the impasse of sovereign mortality. They projected the "pure theory of law" upward and outward, transposing it from the jurisdictional scale of the state to that of the international legal system as a whole.

[22] INTRODUCTION

The question of time or priority had been integral to the empire's jurisdictional chaos. It had proved so hard to foreclose the stateness of the lands and establish the completeness of imperial sovereignty precisely because the lands preceded the empire. The original dynastic unions unfolded on the basis of their law: Ferdinand of Habsburg was crowned king of Bohemia on the basis of Bohemian law, and he ruled Bohemia on the basis of Bohemian law. Once divine right gave way to the notion of states as the origin of law's legitimacy, it was not easy to construe imperial sovereignty as original or nonderived—because it was not: the original authority to rule had been bestowed by the lands. It lingered in the lawmaking power of the lands, which was not jurisdictionally subordinate to imperial law: a law passed by the Bohemian diet was not automatically trumped by one made in the "Austrian" parliament, opening the door to chaotic legal contradictions.

In this context, it had become clear to a young Kelsen that the legal unity of the state depended on a single origin point for law, a single point of "ascription," and that that point could not be understood as a factual or historical or sociological proposition. That left one stuck in an endless mess of constitutional disputes. That singular origin point could only be presumed as a logical one. The legal order must posit what he came to call a Grundnorm—a "basic norm," or foundational norm—from which all subsequent legal norms derived. The basic norm essentially established how other norms could be made: it was a rule about rules, occupying the apex of the "pyramid of legal order."86 In a series of exchanges through the war and in its aftermath, Vienna school jurists developed the argument that the basic norm at the apex of state sovereignty could not in fact be the final point of legal ascription. Rather, it must itself be derived from a still-higher basic norm—the basic norm at the apex of the international legal order. The problem of the identity and continuity of states was crucial evidence for the logical necessity of this construction. The creation and demise of states could become legally understandable only if there was a "higher" legal order outside and above the state, in existence before it and after it. That overarching order banished any legal vacuums between sovereignties. The argument constituted a radical attack on the absoluteness of state sovereignty, now construed as subordinate to international law.

INTRODUCTION [23]

Confronted with the ghostly impasse of state birth and state death, Central European jurists responded with a fit of philosophical rigor—as though it was simply a matter of thinking hard enough, of pursuing logic with enough discipline, of achieving sufficient epistemic purity. They transposed the theologically inflected problem of the origins of sovereignty into a problem of the premise of reasoning, the "point of departure" for thought and law. The argument was not that international law "came first" in a historical sense but that it came first in a logical one: as the problem of discontinuous sovereignty revealed, the world's legal order could only have theoretical coherence if international law's priority was a normative-philosophical presupposition.<sup>87</sup> The Viennese jurists digested the problem of sovereignty's historical sequence into one of philosophical sequence. Legal reasoning needed to begin on the premise of international law, not state sovereignty. International law-higher and prior, always already before and after—provided the continuity that breakable states could not. In making sense of the mortality of sovereignty, the jurists gifted the glow of its erstwhile immortality to international law instead.

As the geographic locus of emergent postimperial sovereignties shifted southward in the decades after World War II, jurisdictional priority remained a key thread, but with the narrative signs reversed. For many jurists from the Global South, the continuity and priority of international law were precisely the problem—and not the solution. In committing them to honor the concessions, liabilities, and obligations adopted by former imperial rulers, the postulate of legal continuity bound postimperial states into structures of economic subordination and stripped self-determination of its emancipatory potential. As they theorized and contested the law of state succession, jurists like the Algerian Mohammed Bedjaoui sought not to stitch together time to preserve order: the existing order was the problem. Where Kunz and his colleagues wrote transfixed by the experience and threat of state extinction, Bedjaoui and his wrote seized by the project of state birth.

Sovereignty as a Knowledge Problem (for Them and Us)

Priorness, priority, the a priori: this book probes the affinity between jurisdictional questions and epistemological ones. It is about the premises of rule, and of reasoning—about the foundations of law and ideas. It does more than explore their structural parallels: it studies their entangled history, as historical actors sought to ground and explain sovereignty after the eclipse of divine right. They had to fashion new sorts of coherence, sense, and unity if those things were no longer simply provided by God or nature. Remaking the legitimacy of sovereignty involved both styles of reasoning and styles of politics, and they evolved woven closely together. Rather than the straightforward slide from theology to law posited by Carl Schmitt, the argument structure here has more in common with the German philosopher Hans Blumenberg's book The Legitimacy of the Modern Age. Blumenberg depicted modern doctrines of progress "reoccupying" positions once held by religion, forced to try to answer questions about the meaning and purpose of history "left over" from Christianity.88 This book shows what happened when positivist understandings of law tried to "answer" the "questions" left over from the divine right and manybodied glory of kings and emperors. They were large shoes to fill, heavy crowns to wear. Ill-equipped to play that role, modern legal thought found itself in a tangle of ideas and interpretations as it tried to reground sovereignty's a priori legitimacy, its nonderivation, its singularity, and its immortality. Kelsen's pure theory of law was only the most dramatic and revealing response to a broader problem: post-God, post-emperor, logical consistency was the only form of guarantee, the only form of truth, the only proof of validity, to which law had access. The legitimacy of law and the unity of state sovereignty could only be epistemological propositions now. Legal reasoning stepped in to suffuse the whole with logic, like grace; logic made the whole, ordering norms harmoniously into consistent chains of norms, providing a rational unity rather than a natural one, a holism of form rather than substance. The jurist, a mini-god, conjured order out of a profoundly disordered world.

[24] INTRODUCTION

This book presents the history of modern sovereignty as an attempt to make sense—as a form of sense seeking. <sup>89</sup> It is about the search for coherence, rather than any fixed or finished arrival points. It approaches sovereignty as a history not only of ideas but also of knowledge and method—a history of the reach for ideas (and often for ideas about ideas, just as sovereignty is law about law). The method, I argue, is the story: one of modern law seeking to make itself rational, seeking to reconcile contradiction, seeking formal logical coherence.

In his "Prospect for a Theory of Nonconceptuality" and other essays, Blumenberg suggested that metaphors granted access to that which could not be translated back (or forward) into pure conceptuality, that which could not be reduced into abstract language—those aspects of the human lifeworld that were "conceptually irredeemable." Through them, one might excavate that buried stratum of stimulations and needs that generated theoretical curiosity—the lifeworld and "catalytic sphere" that sparked metaphors, the "perplexity" for which they stepped in. 90 My path here is parallel: rather than take sovereignty as a particular idea or thing, I present it as a problem, a stimulus, eliciting ever-new attempts to solve, to theorize, to understand, and to order. Each constitutional configuration, like each academic theory, struggled to contain or tame its object, never quite finding coherence or fixing meaning, never quite achieving political or intellectual stability. In recovering that history, I am attentive to the affective desire for order and logical coherence, and the experience of its elusiveness, treating these things not as a kind of incidental backstage to a "real" history of law or ideas but as the main stage of the story itself.<sup>91</sup> Precisely the "nonarrival" of the concepts gifted them their historical dynamism. The Life and Death of States is an intellectual history of theory not working, an intellectual history of an impasse—an intellectual history of not having the words.

INTRODUCTION [25]

If images of sovereignty were symptoms of perplexity, and that perplexity is my subject, The Life and Death of States suggests ways of reconfiguring methodological debates in intellectual and legal history. Neither an opposition between autonomous representations and social worlds nor one between theory and practice, or intellectuals and others, maps meaningfully onto the history here recovered.<sup>92</sup> This search, this grasping, spanned the academic and political domains: sovereignty as sense making was a shared project. The conjugation of intellectual and political order has a variety of modalities at different points of the story, but it is rarely a simple matter of one serving as the "context" for the other. The shared logics and themes across these domains arrangements of law and fact, of priority and sequence, and of the real and the fictional—invite the language of reversibility, or multidirectionality: constitutions were modes of theory making, and, in reverse, concepts were order making. What is a constitution save a living theory of the state in question—the state distilled into abstract form, propositional form, the state on paper? Especially the iterative nature of the Habsburg constitutions (and the relentless debate about them) invites us to see them as the trying out of ideas, as rolling attempts to fix complex, shifting realities into stable forms that had a higherorder regulative and explanatory power than any individual moment (i.e., like theory!)—projects that worked to lift "the truth" out of the endless arc of historical becoming. At the same time, and confronted with the same dilemmas, legal scholars were propelled toward constitutions for thought, drafting and codifying rules of right knowing and right reasoning.

I thus present law as a form of what we can call public reasoning: a mode of reasoning about the public but also of reasoning publicly—of giving reasons, of laying bare the basis of a norm, of a decision, of the state; a form of argumentation in which the supporting chain of rationalization is pivotal. That image of law as public reason is internal to the history told. After the legitimacy of the state became untethered from older genres of right, reasoning itself—in the form of logical consistency and coherence—was asked to shoulder much of that burden. The longing to purify logic of contradictions and mystical leaps, and to purify jurisdiction of contradictions and gaps, came folded together and shared a common pathos in their limitations. This book, then, is a history of the "temporal life" of states in more than one sense: a history of sovereignty on this side of God, seeking legitimacy through the fallible endeavors of the human mind; of notions of sovereignty shifting in time, between a world of many-bodied emperor-kings and the advent of global decolonization; and of states-in-time as a problem, for legal epistemology and for international order. For all these stories, Central Europe has many secrets to share.

[26] INTRODUCTION

Chapter 1 opens at the dawn of the constitutional era in the Habsburg lands. It shows how the elected delegates of the empire's first parliament became the first modern theorists of its sovereignty. They debated the legal status of the empire's historical lands and weighed it against new visions of the empire restructured into a federation of nations. The chapter follows juridical argument about the lands through the constitutions of the early 1860s, before chapter 2 turns to the dramatic restructuring of the empire in the Settlement of 1867. The Settlement pioneered a new form of dual sovereignty, straining the line between constitutional and international law. In the face of heated public controversy about the location and meaning of sovereignty, a new scholarly field—Austrian constitutional law—emerged at the universities to study and teach the same questions. The codification of states tangled together with the codification of disciplines. Here we meet Georg Jellinek-young, passionate, persecuted, and certain that theories of sovereignty needed to be completely rethought. Chapter 3 tracks debate about the legal status of both lands and nations through to the empire's collapse. As Czech-speaking politicians like Karel Kramář argued that the Kingdom of Bohemia had retained its sovereignty in suspended form, others proposed turning ethnic nations into legal collectives and granting them autonomy on a nonterritorial basis. Both visions of partial and dimmed sovereignty outlived the empire that spawned them.

Chapter 4 returns to Jellinek at the century's turn and places him at the center of epochal transformations in the history of legal thought. I show how Jellinek introduced neo-Kantian philosophy into legal science and recast its epistemological foundations, shaping the departures of his student, Hans Kelsen. In conversation with Freud and others, Kelsen pursued a "pure" legal science that dissolved the state into an abstract system of norms. While he worked, states began dissolving in an all-too-concrete sense: chapter 5 analyzes the legal ends of Habsburg sovereignty and the construction of a new order in Central Europe. Ideas forged in the fight over imperial sovereignty now became resources for international claim making, with Czechs and Hungarians depicting their states as the legal heirs of their historical kingdoms. As peacemakers struggled to determine which states were new and which were old, Kelsen and his Viennese circle of collaborators thrashed out a legal theory capable of grasping the birth and death of states on a philosophical level—the subject of chapter 6. Their system, the pure theory of law, offered an explanation for the ultimate origin of law and reconfigured the relationship between sovereignty and international law. If chapters 5 and 6 explore how political actors and scholars made sense of the end of empire in Central Europe, chapter 7 follows these ideas and arguments into the era of global decolonization after World War II. A new round of claims about the resurrection of pre-imperial sovereignty echoed through the postwar international order. Again, one questioned how states live and how they die in international law. The chapter's final section shows how these problems "returned" from the Global South to Europe at the end of the Cold War, with the implosion of the USSR and a new wave of old-new states across Central, Eastern, and Southern Europe.

INTRODUCTION [27]

Readers wishing to trace the story of modern legal thought can move from the second half of chapter 2 to chapter 4 and to then chapter 6. But the book's structure, swinging back and forth between scholarly and political domains, is integral to its argument, showing how states and the ideas designed to capture them were reconfigured in parallel. Each wing reflects new light on the other: we see the worldly strains of sovereignty rippling through systems of philosophy, and we see searching questions about the real and the true playing out in public life. In smudging the line between making states and making knowledge, this book suggests new ways of writing the intellectual history of international order.

INDEX

Abi-Saab, Georges M., 273 Aboriginal peoples, 266. See also Indigenous peoples absolutism: constitutional issues and, 12, 29, 41, 45, 48, 51-54, 58, 61, 77, 83, 116-19, 123, 132, 229-30, 235, 325n22; dual sovereignty and, 61, 77, 83; enlightened, 7, 9; Francis Joseph and, 12, 53-54; legal ambitions of, 45-48; neoabsolutism, 31, 45-48, 53, 61, 108, 280-81 111, 123, 229-30, 306n87; Palacký and, 36; pluralism and, 45-48; state formation and, 7, 9; return to, 29; Thun and, 83-84 Adler, Victor, 222 Adriatic Sea, 109 Albania, 257 Alexandrowicz, Charles Henry: Anand and, 262-63, 375n38; articles of, 262, 264-65; background of, 259, 261; circle of, 261; death of, 267; decolonization and, 255, 259, 261-69, 272, 281, 375n27, 375n30, 375n33, 375n38, 376n62; India and, 261-63, 375n30; India Study Group and, 261; international law and, 255, 261-63, 272, 281, 375n30, 376n62; An Introduction to the History of the Law of Nations in the East Indies, 266-67; Madras School of Law and, 261; Marek and, 259, 269, 272, 281; Poland and, 259, 261, 265, 269, 272, 281; sovereignty and, 255, 259, 261-69, 272, 281, 375n27, 375n30, 375n33, 375n38, 376n62; Third World Approaches to International Law and, 262; United Nations and, 261 Algeria, 20, 23, 260, 265, 374n26 Allies: Buxton and, 134; draft treaty of, 19; Entente and, 135; human rights and, 137; Kun and, 353n41; new international order and, 184, 188, 191, 194-96, 207, 211; Supreme Council of, 36on145 "All-India Seminar," 263 Alsace-Lorraine, 105, 207 issues and, 28-59, 61-63, 66-69; dual Anand, Ram Prakash, 20, 257, 262-63, 265, 286, 375n38 Andrássy, Julius Gyula, 56-57, 61, 66, 69, 308n2, 313n62 Anghie, Antony, 14, 259 annexation: dual sovereignty and, 82-83, 317n142; Nazi Germany and, 256-57, 269, 272; new international order and, 185, 202, 207-9, 212, 214; USSR and, anti-Semitism, 4, 73-74, 95, 103, 144-45, 252, 314n92 Antonowicz, Lech, 281 Apponyi, Albert: aristocracy and, 70, 73; background of, 70-71; Catholicism and, 70; dual sovereignty and, 65-77, 84; Hungary and, 13, 65-77, 84, 122, 190-91, 202, 206, 353nn37-38, 357n99, 365n54; Kelsen and, 365n54; new international order and, 190-91, 202, 206, 353nn37-38, 357n99, 365n54; Paris Peace Conference and, 190-91, 206 "Apponyi's Evidence against the Reality of the Austrian United-State Idea" (Tezner), 75 aristocracy: Andrássy, 61; Apponyi, 70, 73; dynastic rule and, 10; estates and, 54 (see also estates); feudal, 108; historical-constitutional tradition and, 116; Kramář on, 116-17; privileges of, 17; public law and, 89; sovereignty and, 10, 17, 51, 54, 61, 70, 73, 89, 108, 116-17; Szécsen, 51, 108 Armenia, 134 Armitage, David, 1, 375n27 Article 19 (Constitution of 1867), 126-29, 131, 134, 136, 139, 203, 3331167 Ausgleich. See Settlement of 1867 Australia, 15, 104, 132, 173, 263, 266-67 Austria: Archduke of, 8; Bohemia and, 8, 22, 47, 57, 62, 79-80, 89, 103, 113-21, 124-25, 193, 196-99, 209, 213, 228, 316n135, 32on188; constitutional sovereignty and, 57-102 (see also dual sovereignty); end of Cold War and, 277; France and, 125, 236-37, 246; League of Nations and, 183, 194, 200, 333n166, 354n62; Marxism and, 16-17, 103, 128-31, 252, 357n99, 371n217; new international order and, 181-82, 185-202, 206-9, 212-13; Paris Peace Conference and, 190-92, 195, 209, 237, 374n17; Provisional National Assembly, 182; pure theory of law and, 142-45, 161, 168-69, 173, 177, 179; Republic of, 19, 194-200, 254, 256-57, 272, 277, 354n2, 356n87, 365n61; Schuselka and, 28-29, 49, 55; state birth and, 182-85, 193-200, 219, 222-23, 228-31, 234-37, 246-47, 252-53; as successor to the empire, 194-200; Treaty of Saint-Germain and, 19, 194, 237, 333n167, 356n87, 373n5. See also Habsburg Empire

[386] INDEX

Austria (continued)

Austrian Civil Code, 76 Austrian Littoral, 34–36 Austrian Pensions (State Succession)

Case, 356n87

Austrian State Dictionary: Handbook of All Austrian Public Law (Ulbrich and Mischler), 91

Austro-Marxism: national questions and, 16, 17, 129-33, 286, 299n65, 357n99; Kelsen and, 223, 252-53, 363n23, 371n217

Authoritarian State, The: An Essay on the Problem of the Austrian State (Voegelin), 29–30

autolimitation, 95, 97, 171, 292110 autonomy: constitutional issues and,

11–12, 31, 39, 41, 44, 52, 54, 57, 59, 61–62, 105–8, 114, 134, 138, 185, 213, 229; decolonization and, 273–74; dual sovereignty and, 57, 59, 61–62, 67, 71, 81, 99; fictional states and, 104–8, 111, 114, 117–23; historical rights and, 11–12, 36, 47, 53–54, 61–62, 67, 75–76, 81, 105–6, 108–24; Irish nationalists and, 16; national, 26, 33, 106, 129–34, 137–38, 185, 202–3, 209, 211; new international order and, 185–86, 192–94, 202–3, 206, 209, 211, 213, 355n77; of the empire's lands, 8–9, 11–12, 31, 36, 38–39, 43–45, 51–55, 57–59, 61–62, 67–68, 71, 75–76, 78, 81, 99, 104–24, 186, 229, 325n18; self-government and, 44, 67, 107, 202; sovereignty and, 1, 25–26, 44, 52, 57, 59, 81, 104–6, 130, 132, 138, 193, 211, 229, 273–74, 284; temporality and, 284; United States and, 57. See also nonterritorial autonomy

Avenarius, 171

Bach, Alexander von, 47, 49
Baernreither, Joseph Maria, 131
Baldus, Manfred, 228
Banat, 127
Baron Münchhausen, 75, 227, 244, 270 basic norm (Grundnorm), 22, 220, 225–31, 233–34, 240–42, 244, 248, 250, 288, 289, 301n86, 364n41, 364n46, 365n52, 367n96, 369n164, 384n18; Habsburg origins of, 228–31
Battle of Mohacs, 199

Battle of Monacs, 199
Battle of the White Mountain, 9, 115, 117, 124, 187–89, 352n34

Bauer, Otto: juridical persons and, 129, 131; Marxism and, 129, 131, 286; national questions and, 129, 131, 137, 202, 286; Republic of Austria and, 194; state birth and, 237

Bavaria, 138, 193, 249 Baxi, Upendra, 255, 262–65, 286, 375n35 Becker, Peter, 80, 285

Bedjaoui, Mohammed: decolonization and, 23, 255, 260–61, 273–79, 374nn22–26, 379n103; international law and, 23, 255, 260–61, 273–79, 374nn22–26, 379n103; New International Economic Order and, 276

Beiser, Frederick C., 154, 339n67 Belarus, 381n146 Belgium, 32–33, 191 Bell, Duncan, 285

Beneš, Edvard: Czechoslovakia and, 124, 139–40, 184, 186–89, 193, 208, 210, 256, 352n31; League of Nations and, 139–40, 193; minority rights and, 139–40; state birth and, 184, 186–89, 256; new international order and, 184–89, 208, 210

INDEX [387]

Benton, Lauren, 255, 296n42, 35on5 Berman, Nathaniel, 267-68 Bernatzik, Edmund: constitutional issues and, 54; dual sovereignty and, 60, 69-70, 74, 83, 3141191, 32111205; Kelsen and, 60, 164-65; legal knowledge and, 60, 144, 321n205, 342n138; national rights and, 126, 133; as new breed of expert, 60, 83, 321n205; Tezner and, 74, 314n91 Bethlen, István, 191 Beust, Friedrich Ferdinand von, 66, 79 Bidermann, Hermann, 72-73, 99 Bloch, Ernst, 305n63 Blumenberg, Hans, 24 Bohemia: Austria and, 22, 73, 103, 113-21, 124-25, 134, 193, 196-99, 208-9, 212-13, 228, 286, 316n135, 32on188; Battle of the White Mountain and, 9, 115, 117, 124, 187-89, 352n34; constitutional issues and, 31, 33, 35-44, 47, 49-51, 54, 62, 79, 105-7, 109-25, 131, 187, 213, 228, 235, 320n188, 330n133, 352n34; Crown of, 8, 19, 113, 121, 189, 207; Czech speakers and, 17, 35, 37-38, 207, 330n133; dual sovereignty and, 57, 62-63, 73, 76, 79-80, 85, 89-90, 316n135, 321n199; Ferdinand of Habsburg and, 22; fictional states and, 5, 10-13, 19, 44, 54, 79-80, 103, 105-6, 114-24, 140, 188-89, 196, 220, 228, 235-36, 286, 326n35, 352n34; German speakers and, 17, 35, 37-38, 197, 207-15, 285; Habsburg Empire and, 5, 8, 9, 22, 36, 40, 41, 43, 47, 49–51, 54, 57, 62, 76, 89, 103, 105, 107, 109-25, 134, 140, 183, 186-89, 196, 199, 212-13, 228, 235, 316n135, 32on188, 352n34; historical state rights (Staatsrecht) and, 11-12, 54, 105-6, 110-24, 131, 183, 187-89, 207-12, 220, 321n199, 330n133; Hungary and, 5, 8, 12-13, 17, 35, 38, 54, 57, 62, 73, 79-80, 89, 109, 111, 117-18, 121, 134, 183, 186-89, 193, 199, 207, 211-14, 220, 286; international status of, 8, 76, 196, 199, 207-15, 285, 316n135; kings of, 8, 22, 57, 62, 63, 76, 80, 111-12, 117, 124, 183, 352n34; Kelsen and, 162; Kramář and, 26, 103, 116-21, 124, 187-88, 208-11; new international order and, 19, 134, 140, 183, 186-89, 193, 196-97, 199, 207-15, 285; Notes on Bohemian Politics, 119; Palacký and, 28, 31, 33-43, 49-50, 68, 107, 124-25, 130, 140, 302n7, 330n133; sovereignty and, 12-13, 22, 26, 43, 80, 103, 105, 109, 117, 120, 140, 183, 196, 199, 211, 213, 220, 286; state birth and, 183, 186-88, 196, 199, 207, 209, 211, 213-14, 220, 228, 235-36; temporality and, 120-24, 199, 213-14; Three Kings Declaration and, 187 borders: 9, 39, 125, 139; dual sovereignty and, 58; historical, 39, 127, 184, 189-91, 198, 199, 202, 206-12, 285, 357n99; national questions and, 127, 139, 197, 207–15, 285; new international order and, 189-91, 198-99, 202, 206-15, 285, 351ng, 359n125; pure theory of law and, 21, 168, 236, 255; sovereignty and, 9; temporality and, 21, 39, 213, 218, 236, 255, 276 Bosnia-Herzegovina: annexation of, 82-83, 185, 286, 317n142; break up of Yugoslavia and, 280; civilizing mission in, 317n143; as dependent land, 105; dual sovereignty and, 81-83, 185, 286; Ferdinand assassination and, 185; occupation of, 81-83, 185; United Nations and, 381n43 Britain, 236; Apponyi and, 75; Belgium and, 191; constitutional issues and, 3; Czechoslovakia and, 215; dual sovereignty and, 63; empire and, 59, 132, 135, 252, 260, 263, 266, 285, 293n2o, 295n35, 296n44, 381n146; Headlam-Morley and, 239; House of Commons, 67; Irish Home Rule Bill and, 67; new international order and, 135, 140, 191, 195-96, 200, 239, 355n79; Poland and, 269; thinkers from, 6, 251-52 British Foreign Office, 195–96, 269 Brown, Kate, 7 Brunner, Otto, 112-13 Bukovina, 10-11, 16, 36, 127 Bulgaria, 134, 200, 250, 29218 Bull, Hedley, 266 Burma, 256

Buxton, Charles Roden, 134-35

Byelorussia, 277, 381n146

[388] INDEX

Cambodia, 257 Cameroon, 257 Canada, 15, 104, 132 Carinthia, 35-38, 62, 193 Carnap, Rudolf, 222 Carniola, 35-36, 38 Carpathia, 206, 214 Case, Holly, 185, 300n71 Cassirer, Ernst, 170-71, 308n5 Catholicism: Apponyi and, 70; dual sovereignty and, 85, 95; Holy Roman Empire, 9, 13, 49, 64-65, 89, 192, 294n28, 295n40; Jellinek and, 145; Kelsen and, 363n21; Lammasch and, 145; O'Connell and, 380n136; Thun and, 85; Verdross and, 248 Cavalcabo, Eduard, 41 centralization: constitutional issues and, 32, 43, 47-49; dual sovereignty and, 61, 64, 67, 75, 78, 99; fictional states and, 114, 118-19, 121, 124; international law and, 251; new international order and, 352n34; sovereignty and, 7-10, 13-15 Central Organization for a Durable Peace, 133-34, 137 Central Powers, 188 Ceylon, 256, 260, 264-65 Charles, Emperor, 62, 78, 185, 232 Charles the Bold, 9 Cisleithania: Bohemia and, 113; dual sovereignty and, 13, 57-58, 64-69, 78-80, 86-89, 99, 295n38; nationality and, 134 Clam-Martinic, Heinrich Jaroslav, 51-52 Cohen, Hermann, 233, 335n10 Cold War: end of, 27, 277-82, 286, 377n79; realism and, 288, 273, 378n94-95 composite monarchy, 7-8, 12-13, 19, 30, 55, 57, 62, 64, 67, 78, 81, 111, 113, 124, 183, 199, 232 "Conception of the State and Social Psychology, The" (Kelsen), 173 conflict of laws, 22, 228 conquest: decolonization and, 256, 260, 276; new international order and, 209; sovereignty and, 1, 14, 77, 256, constitutional issues: absolutism and, 29, 41, 45, 51-54, 58; autonomy and, 11-12,

31, 39, 41, 44, 52, 54, 57, 59, 61-62, 105-8, 114, 134, 138, 185, 213, 229; Bohemia and, 31, 33, 35-44, 47, 49-51, 54, 62, 79, 105-7, 109-25, 131, 187, 213, 228, 235, 3201188, 3301133, 352134; Britain and, 3; centralization and, 9, 14-15, 32, 43, 47-49; dual sovereignty and, 53-59, 66-83, 86, 113-14, 118, 185, 190-93, 230, 285 (see also dual sovereignty); estates and, 30, 32, 42, 44-45, 47, 52, 54, 303ng; February Patent and, 29, 54-55, 66, 111, 229, 236, 3071121, 308n126; first textbook on, 90; Francis Joseph and, 12, 33, 51, 53-54, 3071100; Galicia and, 34, 36, 42, 45; Habsburg Empire and, 2-19, 25-26, 28-83, 108-14, 126-32, 183, 185-89, 198-99, 203, 208, 215-16, 220, 228-32, 235-36, 284-85, 294n33, 311n39; Hein and, 37, 39-44, 51-54; historical rights and, 11-12, 30, 36, 47-49, 53-54, 61, 64, 68, 76, 105-6, 108, 110-24, 183, 187-89, 191-93, 215, 285, 326n42; Hungary and, 5, 9, 12-13, 32, 38-39, 46-54, 56-59, 61-83, 86, 108-9, 111, 113-14, 118, 121-22, 127, 183, 185, 190-93, 198, 203, 230, 303112, 309112, 309117; Kelsen and, 29, 55, 142 (see also Kelsen, Hans); Kremsier draft and, 29-31, 34, 41, 43-48, 51, 304n44; Lustkandl and, 64-65, 72-73, 83, 85-87; March constitution, 29, 47-48, 50, 126-27, 212, 306n83; Mayer and, 33-38, 41-43; Merkl and, 60; methodology and, 89-92; Metternich and, 32, 40-43, 85; monarchy and, 7-8, 12-13, 19, 30, 36, 44, 47, 55-59, 62-69, 76-83, 100, 102, 111, 113, 122, 124, 183, 189, 192, 206, 232, 235-36; Moravia and, 8-9, 34-42, 57, 107, 110-12, 129, 134, 139; national questions and, 16-18, 31, 32, 35-43, 45, 48-50, 68, 85, 91, 106-7, 124-38, 142, 181, 185, 232, 298n56, 317n146, 325122, 3301115, 3301133, 3331166-67, 357n99; new academic field and, 59-61, 64-65, 83-92; October Diploma and, 29, 53-54, 109-11, 114, 229, 236, 307n121; Palacký and, 28, 31, 33-43, 49-50, 302n7; Pillersdorf constitution, 29, 32-33, 47, 235-36, 303n12;

INDEX [389]

Pragmatic Sanction and, 9, 51, 54, 62-64, 66, 70-71, 74-76, 103, 111, 119, 192, 198; Schuselka and, 28-29, 49, 55; self-government and, 44, 67, 107, 202; Settlement of 1867 and, 13, 16, 30, 54, 57, 192, 295n37; Silesia and, 36, 38, 41; Slovakia and, 39; temporality and, 28, 31, 39-40, 50-53; Tyrol and, 36, 39, 42 Craven, Matthew, 267, 284 Crawford, James, 267-68, 281, 382n1 Creation of States in International Law, The (Crawford), 267 Critique of Pure Reason (Kant), 154, 308n5 Croatia, 2, 9; constitutional issues and, 35; decolonization and, 277, 280; end of Cold War and, 277; Hungary and, 62, 67; new international order and, 196, 201; United Nations and, 3811143 Crowe, Eyre, 195 crownlands, 36, 44, 52, 67, 84, 107, 131, Crown of Saint Wenceslas, 12 Cuba, 186 czars, 239, 291n7 Czechoslovakia: Beneš and, 124, 139-40, 184, 186-89, 193, 208, 210, 256, 352n31; Bohemia and, 17, 124, 183-90, 196, 199-200, 207-15; borders of, 140, 207-15; Britain and, 215; decolonization and, 256, 261, 265, 272, 277-78; dual sovereignty and, 68, 90; empire and, 2-3; end of Cold War and, 277; fictional states and, 124; Headley-Morley on, 199-200; historical rights and, 183, 187-89, 207-12, 220; Jaroslaw and, 109; Kramář and, 26, 116, 120, 124, 187-88, 208-9, 211, 328159; La Nation Tchèque, 186-87; new international order and, 124, 140, 143, 183-96, 199-200, 207-15, 352134; Paris Peace Conference and, 188–91, 199-200, 207-11; Payment of War Tax

Case, 213; sovereignty and, 3, 26, 124,

140, 184, 187, 191, 193, 196, 211, 213-14,

256, 265, 277, 286; state birth and,

Administrative Court and, 213–14;

Three Kings Declaration and, 187;

Young Czechs and, 116

124, 183, 185-90, 245, 250; Supreme

Czernowitz, 84-85, 90, 131 Dalmtatia, 36, 107, 196 Dante, 163-64 Dantscher von Kollesberg, Theodor, 82, 86, 100 Darwin, Charles, 173 Das böhmische Staatsrecht (Kramář), 116 Das Nationalitätenrecht als internationales Problem (Laun), 135 Daston, Lorraine, 84, 289 Deák, Ferenc: dual sovereignty and, 61-66, 69; Easter Article of, 64; fictional states and, 114; Lustkandl and, 65 Deak, John, 317n145, 349n3, 354n62 decolonization, 3, 18; Alexandrowicz and, 255, 259, 261-69, 272, 281, 375n27, 375n30, 375n33, 375n38, 376n62; Anand and, 20, 257, 262-63, 265, 286, 375n38; annexation and, 256-57, 269, 272, 280-81; Austria and, 254, 256-57, 268, 272, 277; autonomy and, 273-74; Baxi and, 255, 262-65, 286, 375n35; Bedjaoui and, 23, 255, 260-61, 273-79, 374nn22-26, 379n103; Beneš and, 256; conquest and, 256, 260, 276; Czechoslovakia and, 256, 261, 265, 272, 277-78; epistemological issues and, 217-84; Habsburg Empire and, 3, 18, 259, 261, 268-69, 272, 277; historical priority and, 259-66; historical sequence and, 258; Hungary and, 256, 259, 268, 277, 285-86; imperialism and, 257, 259, 264-69, 272-74, 278; India and, 257, 260-64, 381n146; international law and, 239-82; jurisdictional sequence and, 258; Kelsen and, 217-20, 237-59, 263-64, 268, 270-74, 287-89, 373n5, 38on136; Kunz and, 256–57, 271, 373n6; League of Nations and, 3811146; legal theory and, 237-77; logical priority and, 266-77; Marek and, 255, 259, 268-73, 278, 281; nation-states and, 18, 259, 270, 284; occupation and, 256, 260, 270-72, 280; positivism and, 262, 265, 267, 272, 376n64; postimperialism and, 257, 268, 273, 278; pure theory

"Czechoslovakia Claims to German Land"

(Laun), 209

[390] INDEX

decolonization (continued) of law and, 237-59, 268, 270-72, 287-89; Responsibility to Protect doctrine and, 259; Romania and, 257, 261, 269; Russia and, 277-80; self-determination and, 266-67, 273; sovereignty and, 255-82; temporality and, 255-82; Verdross and, 268, 271 de jure, 19, 124, 188, 195-96, 280-81, 352n34 dependent lands, 105 Derrida, Jacques, 20 Dessewffy, Emil, 51 Dilthey, Wilhelm, 147-48 Dirks, Nicholas, 284 divine right, 12, 14, 20, 22-24, 142, 288 Donau, 109 Droysen, Gustav, 147 dualism: constitutional issues and, 56-59, 66, 68, 70-73, 81-82; crown and country, 311n39; fictional states and, 111-14, 118; legal theory and, 227, 240; new international order and, 360n157; pure theory of law and, 168, 171, 174-79, 185, 190, 195, 212, 214; secret science of, 56-57; Seton-Watson on, 12-13; state birth and, 240 dual sovereignty: absolutism and, 61, 77, 83; annexation and, 82-83, 317n142; Apponyi and, 65-77, 84; autonomy and, 57, 59, 61-62, 67, 71, 81, 99; Bernatzik and, 56, 60, 69-70, 74, 83, 314n91, 321n205; Bohemia and, 57, 62-63, 73, 76, 79-80, 85, 89-90, 316n135, 321n199; borders and, 58; Bosnia-Herzegovina and, 81-83; Britain and, 63; centralization and, 61, 64, 67, 75, 78, 99; Cisleithania and, 57-58, 64-69, 78-80, 86-89, 99; Czechoslovakia and, 68, 90; Deák and, 61-66, 69; epistemological issues and, 59-61, 89, 95-99, 102; estates and, 63, 66, 72-76, 81, 84, 89; February Patent and, 66; Francis Joseph and, 57, 66, 69, 80; Habsburg Empire and, 56-89, 99-100; historical rights and, 61, 64, 68, 76, 321n199, 326n42; Hungary and, 56-83, 86, 89, 92, 96-102, 316n135, 319n178; indivisibility and,

62, 75-77, 96; international law and,

59, 74, 76-83, 86, 95; Jellinek and, 56, 60, 74, 79, 86-87, 92-102, 316n130; Kelsen and, 60, 74, 232; k.&k. and, 56-58; legal theory and, 92, 96-97, 102, 230; Lustkandl and, 63-65, 72, 83, 85-87, 314n91, 319n168; Magyars and, 68, 71, 80; monarchy and, 56-59, 62-69, 72-83, 86-88, 91, 99-102, 194; Moravia and, 57, 92; Musil and, 56, 58, 60, 70, 75, 80, 86, 308n5; occupation and, 82-83; original two-state solution and, 66-69; Palacký and, 68; Paris Peace Conference and, 70; pluralism and, 57, 61; postimperialism and, 59; Pragmatic Sanction and, 62-66, 70-71, 74-76, 320n188; provinces and, 62, 64, 67, 81-82; public law and, 57, 63, 65, 71, 73, 82-91, 96, 101, 309112, 310131, 3161130, 3181164; Romania and, 68; Seton-Watson on, 12; Settlement of 1867 and, 12-13, 16, 26, 29, 56-61, 64-74, 78-81, 86, 96, 100, 192, 295n37; statehood and, 58, 61, 63, 67-68, 76, 81, 97-98; taxonomies of self/world and, 97-100; Tezner and, 65, 73-79, 82-84, 102, 314n91; theological nature of, 12; vanishing empire and, 69-77; Wissenschaft and, 94, 99-100 Duke of Burgundy, 9

Dvorčák, Viktor, 211, 215

Easter Article, 64

Ebengreuth, Arnold Luschen von, 47

Egypt, 16, 59, 80, 133–34, 273

együttes, 70

Ehrenberg, Victor, 94, 146, 154-58,

322n222 Ehrlich, Eugen, 10–11, 16, 133–35, 288, 383n15

Eisenmann, Louis, 13, 195 elective kingship, 62–64, 115, 187 electoral law, 32, 134 Elisabeth (Sisi), 61, 66 elites, 11, 108, 185, 187, 231, 311139 empire: Britain and, 59, 132, 135, 252, 260, 263, 266, 285, 293n20, 295n35, 296n44, 381n146; category and, 1, 7, 71, 84, 106, 231; collapse of, 2–5, 15, 18, 21, 26, 31–32, 57, 105, 132–38,

INDEX [391]

181-82, 195, 213, 252-53, 258-59, 272, 284-85, 291-92, 328, 367n98; decolonization and, 1, 3, 255-82 (see also decolonization); India and, 296n44; nation-states and, 1, 3, 18, 59, 186, 195, 200-201, 253, 259, 284; new international order and, 181-216; sorting self/ globe and, 13-18; sovereignty and, 1-7, 10-22, 26 (see also sovereignty); statehood and, 2, 18, 44, 67, 97-98, 104, 123, 183, 185, 190-93, 196, 249, 259, 286, 291n7, 294n33. See also Habsburg Empire Engel-Jánosi, Friedrich, 60 Engels, Friedrich, 17, 293n25, 299nn63-65 Entente, 134-35, 195 epistemological issues: decolonization and, 217-84; dual sovereignty and, 59-61, 89, 95-99, 102; fictional states and, 10-11, 13, 19, 59, 71-75, 77, 103-4, 120-24, 192-93, 195-96, 286; historical epistemology and, 289, 384n20; hypostatization and, 170-76; legal thought and, 141-80, 217-54, 266-77; mythological methodology and, 172-76; neo-Kantianism and, 13, 26, 93, 144, 146, 148, 153-57, 160-61, 170, 226-27, 233, 308n5, 335n10-11, 339n72, 344n180; positivism and, 13-14, 20-21, 24, 85, 89-92, 142, 144, 147-53, 171, 182, 190, 219, 225, 228, 231, 234, 262, 267, 272, 287, 292n8, 321n199, 337n30, 362n12, 364n41; pure theory of law and, 141, 143-44, 162-80, 217-54, 337n30, 340n89, 4345n186; sovereignty and, 5, 10, 20-26, 166, 258, 266-71, 283-84; state birth and, 217-20, 237-84, 369n164 eros, 146, 163, 176, 221 "Eros and Psyche: A Biological-Psychological Study" (Kelsen), 163 estates: aristocratic privileges of, 17; Battle of the White Mountain and, 9; consensual agreements and, 8; constitutional issues and, 30, 32, 42, 44-45, 47, 52, 54, 230, 303n9; definition of, 293n22; dual sovereignty and, 63, 66, 72-76, 81, 84, 89; elites and, 11; feudal, 11-12, 44, 59, 108-12, 118, 184, 191,

295n35, 311n39; fictional states and, 110-15, 118-23; historical rights and, 11-12; historical rights and, 30; into states, 110-15; land ordinances and, 111, 114-19, 122; new international order and, 187, 201, 351n10; Settlement of 1867 and, 295n37

Estonia, 137, 200, 280, 280-81, 382n157
Ethiopia, 257

Exner, Adolf, 127

Fazekas, Paul von, 71-72

February Patent: constitutional issues and, 29, 54–55, 66, 111, 229, 236, 307n121, 308n126; dual sovereignty and, 66; October Diploma and, 29, 111,

229, 307n121 Federal Republic of Yugusolovia (FRY), federalism, 33, 36, 49, 54, 59, 67, 82, 99, 100, 102, 116, 119, 129, 138, 203, 232, 248, 302n91 Ferdinand II, 115 Ferdinand of Habsburg, 22, 78-79, 111, 187 feudal system: aristocracy and, 108; crownlands and, 44; dynastic legal formations and, 11; estates and, 11-12, 44, 59, 108-12, 118, 184, 191, 295n35, 311n39; privileges and, 110, 112, 118, 184; public law and, 12; Settlement of 1867 and, 59 fictional states: 10-13, 103-6; absolutism and, 116-19, 123, 132; Austria and, 103-5, 109, 113-30, 133-39; autonomy and, 104-8, 111, 114, 117-21, 129-34, 137-38, 325n18; Bohemia and, 5, 10-13, 19, 44, 54, 79–80, 103, 105–6, 114–24, 140, 188-89, 196, 220, 228, 235-36, 286, 326n35, 352n34; centralization and, 114, 118-19, 121, 124; Cisleithania and, 113, 134; Czechoslovakia and, 124; dualism and, 111-14, 118; epistemological issues and, 10-11, 13, 19, 59, 71-75, 77, 103-4, 120-24, 192-93, 195-96, 286; estates and, 110-15, 118-23; global history and, 104-6; Habsburg Empire as, 10-13, 19, 59, 71-75, 77, 124, 192-93, 195-96, 286; historical rights and, 11-13, 106, 108, 110-24, 183, 188-89,

191-93, 216; Hungary and, 13, 107-9, fictional states (continued) Galicia: constitutional issues and, 34, 36, 42, 45; empire and, 9; Kelsen and, 162; 114, 183, 190-93, 199, 205, 220, 230, new international order and, 196, 207 259; indivisibility and, 120, 132; international law and, 79-83, 103-6, 117, Gautsch, Paul, 145 185-93, 195-201; Jellinek and, 103-5, Geertz, Clifford, 104 121; Kelsen and, 121; Kramář and, gemeinsam, 69-74, 314n76 103, 116-21, 124; legal history and, 10, General Theory of the State (Jellinek), 177 120-24; made real, 104, 184-93; monar-General Theory of the State (Kelsen), 218 chy and, 105, 108-13, 116, 120, 122-24; Geneva School, 252 Moravia and, 107, 110-12, 129, 134, 139; Gentle Civilizer of Nations, The (Kosken-Palacký and, 107; paper states and, 106, niemi), 278 114-20, 185-90; Pragmatic Sanction Gerber, Carl Friedrich von, 89-90, 157, and, 103, 111, 119; provinces and, 104-8, 339n64 113-14, 325n18; public law and, 110, 113, German Society of International Law, 137 113-23, 115, 119, 126, 131-32, 136; search Ghana, 257, 384n18 for correct name for, 105-10; self-Gibraltar, 269 determination and, 119-20, 325n22; Gladstone, William, 59, 67 Settlement of 1867 and, 104, 113, 124; Global South, 23, 253, 273, 276, 278 Silesia and, 107, 109; temporality and, Gobbi, Ferdinand, 34 105, 121-24; Tezner and, 122-23 God: divine right and, 12, 14, 20, 22-24, Finland, 205-6, 256; end of Cold War 142, 288; Kelsen and, 24, 169, and, 277; Koskenniemi and, 95, 255, 174-79, 217-18, 227-28, 249, 287-88, 273, 277-78, 281-82, 378nn94-95 347n209, 347n230, 349n357, 371n208; Ford, Lisa, 255 positivism and, 14, 85, 89, 144, 148, France, 75, 125; Austria and, 125, 236-37, 225; Schmitt and, 20, 23, 179, 349n257 246; Charles the Bold and, 9; legal "God and the State" (Kelsen), 174, thinkers and, 6, 125; Morocco and, 347n209, 347nn230-36 269; revolution in, 3, 32 Goldmark, Joseph, 34 Gorbachev, Mikhail, 277 Francis I, 9 Francis Joseph: absolutism and, 12, Gorky, Maxim, 169 53-54; constitutional issues and, 12, Goss, David K., 323n242 33, 51, 53-54, 232, 307n100; corona-Graduate Institute of International Studtion of, 33; death of, 185; dual soveries, 269-70 eignty and, 57, 66, 69, 80; empire and, Graeber, David, 63, 115 12, 33, 51–54, 57, 66, 69, 80, 126, 185, Greece, 59, 292n8 187, 232, 307n100; national equality of Grenada, 289 "Grotius and India" (Alexandrowicz), 262 rights and, 125-26; new international order and, 185, 187; various titles of, 57 Grundnorm. See basic norm Freud, Sigmund: Imago and, 173; The Inter-Grünhut, Carl, 161 pretation of Dreams, 162, 221; Kelsen Guggenheim, Paul, 269-70 and, 4, 26, 141, 162-63, 172-76, 221, 223, Gumplowicz, Ludwig, 33, 100, 109-10, 334n6, 345n193, 345n198, 346nn204-6, 126, 332n143 347n222, 348n239; mythological methodology and, 172; pure theory Habsburg Empire: Bohemia and, 8, 22, 35, of law and, 4, 26, 141, 162-63, 172-76, 37, 40, 47-51, 57, 62, 73, 79-80, 89-90, 237n222, 342nn132-33, 345n193, 103, 113-21, 124-25, 134, 186-88, 196-99, 346nn199-206, 348n239; Totem and 208-9, 212-13, 228, 286, 316n135, Taboo, 173, 346n206, 347n222 320n188; civilizing missions and, Frisch, Hans von, 129 291n7, 317n143; collapse of, 2-4, 15, Fukuyama, Francis, 278 18, 21, 142, 181-83, 194-200, 218, 220,

[392] INDEX

INDEX [393]

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, 94, 153, 237-38, 252-53, 256, 258-59, 284-86, 292n8; composite monarchy and, 7-8, 295n40 12-13, 19, 30, 55, 57, 62, 64, 67, 78, 81, Heidegger, Martin, 147 Hein, Franz Freiherr von: as centralist, 111, 113, 124, 183, 199, 232; constitutional issues and, 2-8, 10, 12-14, 17-19, 39; constitutional issues and, 37-44, 25-26, 28-83, 89, 110-14, 124-32, 51-54; Palacký and, 28, 41; Rieger and, 179, 183, 185, 188, 195, 198, 203, 220, 39-40 Helfert, Josef Alexander von, 49 228-32, 235-36, 239, 248, 284-85, 294n33, 311n39; Crown of Saint Wenchereditary lands, 9, 63, 89, 107 eslas and, 12; decolonization and, 3, Hernritt, Rudolf von, 126-27 256-59, 261, 268-69, 272, 277; dual Herren, Madeleine, 80 sovereignty and, 26, 56-84, 88-89, 91, historical rights, 4, 16, 285; Bohemia and, 230, 232; dynastic marriages and, 8; 11-12, 54, 105-6, 110-24, 131, 183, fictional states and, 103-6, 110-18, 124, 187-89, 207-12, 220, 3211199, 326142, 129-34, 138 (see also fictional states); 330n133; constitutional issues and, Hungary and, 2, 5, 9, 12-13, 17-18, 35, 11-12, 30, 36, 47-49, 53-54, 61, 64, 68, 46-47, 54, 57-67, 70-75, 79-83, 96, 98, 76, 105-6, 108, 110-24, 183, 187-89, 109, 114, 118, 121, 127, 129, 135, 185-86, 191-93, 215, 285, 326n42; Czechoslo-189-95, 198, 200, 205, 230, 237, 259, vakia and, 124, 183, 187-90, 207-15; estates and, 11-12, 30; fictional states 284, 286, 295n38, 296n45, 365n54; in a world of empires, 3, 13–18, 81, 98, and, 11-13, 106, 110-24, 183, 188-89, 104, 284, 286; Kremsier draft and, 30, 191-93, 216; Hungary and, 11-12, 49, 34, 43, 46-48, 51, 127, 185, 212; lands 53-54, 61, 64, 68, 76, 108, 113-14, 122, vs. nations, 17–18, 35–43, 129–32; legal 183, 190-93, 204-9, 211, 214; Moravia existence of, 13, 19, 59, 70-77, 124, and, 110–12; new international order 192-93, 195-96, 286; Metternich and, and, 18, 124, 183-84, 187-93, 204-16, 32, 40-43, 85; national rights and, 285; territory and, 184, 189, 206-15, 16-18, 35, 37-38, 42-43, 49, 124-40, 285 202, 208, 209, 211; new international historical sequence, 23, 248, 258-59, order and, 181-216; Ottomans and, Hitler, Adolf, 4, 103, 139, 163, 215, 277, 3, 14, 81, 259; pure theory of law and, 4-5, 22, 141-44, 161-62, 169-70, 285, 373n5 217-54; Reichsrat and, 108-9, 111, Hitschmann, Eduard, 172 123, 187; Settlement of 1867 and, 13, Hobbes, Thomas, 21 Hofmannsthal, Hugo von, 221 16, 56-83, 192, 295n37 (see also dual sovereignty); sovereignty and, 2, 5-7, Holy Crown of Saint Stephen, 12, 67 11-13, 15-20, 22, 26, 30-32, 34, 36, Holy Roman Empire, 9, 13, 49, 64-65, 89, 43-45, 47-49, 52-53, 59, 67, 72, 76-81, 192, 294n28, 295n40 Huber, Alfons, 88-89 89, 91-92, 96-99, 104-6, 142, 183, 185, 192, 196-200, 220, 229-32, 253-54, human rights, 137 284-86, 294n33, 301n85; state birth Hume, David, 171 and, 218, 220, 228-35, 239, 248-53 Hungarian-Austrian Constitutional Law Hague, The, 133, 281 (Lustkandl), 63-64 Hall, H. Duncan, 200 Hungarian Upper House, 203 Haller, Edouard de, 138 Hungary: Apponyi and, 13, 65-77, 84, Halter, Josef, 38 122, 190-91, 202, 206, 353nn37-38, Havliček, Franz, 233 357n99, 365n54; Bohemia and, 5, 8, Hayek, Friedrich von, 16, 222, 252, 298n56 12-13, 17, 35, 38, 54, 57, 62, 73, 79-80, Headlam-Morley, James, 195-200, 210, 89, 109, 111, 117-18, 121, 134, 183, 239, 269 186-89, 193, 199, 207, 211-14, 220,

[394] INDEX

Hungary (continued)

286; constitutional issues and, 32, 35, 38-39, 46-54, 56-83, 303112, 309112, 309n17; Croatia and, 67; declares war on Croatia, 62; decolonization and, 256, 259, 268, 277; dual sovereignty and, 56-83, 86, 89, 92, 96-102, 316, 316n135; empire and, 2, 5, 9, 12-13, 17-18, 35, 46-47, 54, 57-67, 70-75, 79-83, 96, 98, 109, 114, 118, 121, 127, 129, 135, 185-86, 189-95, 198, 200, 205, 230, 237, 259, 284, 286, 295n38, 296n45, 365n54; end of Cold War and, 277; fictional states and, 13, 107-9, 114, 183, 190-93, 199, 205, 220, 230, 259; frontiers of, 201–15; international status of, 77-83, 183, 190-93, 259, 285-86; Kun and, 353nn41-42; independence of, 57-58, 61-64, 66-83, 114, 122, 183, 190-93; Magyars and, 17, 68, 71, 185, 309n12, 357n112; Monroe Doctrine of, 79-80; new international order and, 183-195, 198-208, 211-15; October Diploma and, 54, 111, 114; Paris Peace Conference and, 70, 116, 183, 190-92, 237, 259, 353n41, 374n17; Pragmatic Sanction and, 51, 62-64, 71; Russia and, 61; Slovakia and, 39, 189, 208, 211-12, 36on151; sovereignty and, 12-15, 18, 56-83, 96, 98, 109, 117, 183, 185, 190-93, 199, 220, 230, 254, 259, 284-86; state birth and, 192-93, 237, 259, 272, 365n54

Hye, Hans Peter, 67, 353n10

Identity and Continuity of States in Public International Law, The (Marek), 268–69, 271
Ihering, Rudolf von, 127
illogical law, 176–80
Imago journal, 173
imperial lands, 44, 107
India: Alexandrowicz and, 261–63, 375n30; Anand and, 20, 257, 262–63, 265, 286, 375n38; decolonization and, 257, 260–64, 381n146; Ehrlich and, 134; empire and, 296n44; Laun and, 135; Madras School of Law and, 261; Pakistan and, 16, 59; partitioning of, 16, 59; princely states and, 284;

Renner on, 132; sovereignty and, 20, 132, 260–64, 284
Indian School of International Studies, 263
Indian Yearbook for International Affairs
(India Study Group), 261, 375n30
India Study Group, 261, 375n30
India Study Group, 266, 284, 294n30
individualities, 107–8
individual lands, 44, 107
indivisibility, 36, 44, 47, 52, 338n52
Indonesia, 20, 256, 258
International Court of Justice, 260–61
International Journal of Psycho-analysis, 173 international law: Alexandrowicz and, 255, 261-63, 272, 281, 375n30, 376n62; Anand and, 20, 257, 262-63, 265, 286, 375n38; Bedjaoui and, 23, 255, 260-61, 273-79, 374nn22-26, 379n103; crisis of juridical cognition and, 237-44; decolonization and, 255-82; Department of Constitutional and International Law and, 261; dual sovereignty and, 59, 74, 76-83, 86, 95; empire and, 77-83; equality and, 1; German Society of International Law, 137; Global South and, 23, 253, 273, 276, 278; Graduate Institute of International Studies and, 269-70; Indian Yearbook for International Affairs and, 261; Jellinek and, 4-5, 26, 86, 95, 104, 144-45, 152, 165, 292nn9-10, 319n169, 336n13; juridical persons and, 128-32; Kelsen and, 4-5, 22, 26, 183, 217-20, 224, 236, 240-51, 255, 258, 261, 268, 271-73, 288, 362112, 3691164, 371n206, 371n208, 373n5;; Koskenniemi and, 95, 255, 273, 277-78, 281-82, 378nn94-95; League of Nations and, 1-3, 16, 133-39, 193-94, 200, 219, 285, 354n62, 381n46; logical world making and, 250-54; nationality law and, 138–40; nation-states and, 1–2, 7, 19, 23, 26, 59, 103, 125, 129-32, 135-40, 179, 184, 186, 191-95, 205, 209, 213, 240, 246, 248-57, 260-66, 271, 276-77; new international order and, 183, 190, 194, 200-201, 205; perspectival orientation of, 262; pluralism and, 5 (see also pluralism); Poland and, 264;

INDEX [395]

positivism and, 14, 190, 262, 267, 272, 292n8, 296n46, 362n12, 376n74; postimperialism and, 218-19, 222, 228-30, 237, 239, 242-44, 246, 249-54; Principles of International Law, 255; priority of, 22-23; pure theory of law and, 4, 22, 26, 217-54; rise of modern, 14; standard of civilization and, 292n8; state birth and, 217-20, 224, 236, 239-84; temporality and, 249-50, 255-88; Third World Approaches to International Law and, 262 International Women's Suffrage Alliance, 316n135 Interpretation of Dreams, The (Freud), 162, 221 "Introduction Note" (Hungarian delegation), 207 Introduction to the History of the Law of Nations in the East Indies, An (Alexandrowicz), 266-67 Iraq, 256 Ireland, 59, 63, 67, 199 Irish Home Rule Bill, 67 Israel, 256 Italy, 2, 50, 93, 224

Jaroslaw, Heinrich, 109 Jászi, Oszkár, 133, 215 Jellinek, Adolf, 92-93, 162 Jellinek, Camilla, 93, 95, 144-46, 165, 322n211, 336n22 Jellinek, Georg: anti-Semitism and, 4, 74, 95, 144-45, 322n225; appointment as professor, 144-45; autolimitation and, 95, 97, 171, 292n10; background of, 4, 92-95; death of, 165, 322n225; dual sovereignty and, 60-61, 79, 92, 99, 166, 316n130; education of, 94-95; empire and, 4-6, 15, 26, 98, 294n33; epistemology and, 5, 21, 26, 92, 94-97, 99-100, 102, 144, 147–62, 165–67, 170–71, 177, 219-20, 247, 251, 287, 335110-11, 338n38, 338n52, 344n180; fictional states and, 103-4, 106, 121; Habsburg Empire and, 4-6, 15, 60-61, 79-80, 86-87, 92-96, 98-100, 102-4, 121, 127, 162, 235, 287, 294n33, 316n130, 337n31, 341n123, 365n61; Heidelberg and, 4, 144, 146-47, 161-62, 164-65, 322n225, 336n24; humanism and, 147-48, 162, 177; Hungarian Monroe doctrine and, 79-80; international law and, 4-5, 26, 86, 95, 104, 144-45, 152, 165, 292nn9-10, 319n169, 336n13; Judaism and, 4, 74, 92-93, 95, 144-45, 162, 322n225; Kant and, 146, 153-56, 160, 170, 335nn10-11 (see also Kant, Immanuel; neo-Kantianism); Kelsen and, 4-5, 26, 74, 121, 144, 154, 161-62, 164-68, 170-71, 177, 217, 219, 235, 247, 251, 287, 335110-11, 3431146, 344n180, 365n61; law as abstraction, 149-50, 167, 177; natural sciences and, 94, 96-97, 99-100, 144, 147, 149-50, 152, 154, 156, 159, 166-67, 247, 287, 323n247; neo-Kantianism and, 26, 93, 144, 146, 148, 153-57, 160-61, 170, 335n10-11, 344n180; philosophy and, 26, 94, 97, 146-48, 153-57, 160-61, 166, 170, 287, 335n10-11, 338n52, 340n93, 344n180; positivism and, 21, 92, 94, 96, 144, 147-48, 150, 153, 287, 3411113; pure theory of law and, 4, 144, 165-68, 170-71, 220, 235, 251, 287, 335n10-11, 344n180 (see also Kelsen, Hans); Sein/ Sollen (fact/norm) distinction and, 121, 144, 149-50, 152-53, 156, 158-61, 165-67, 170, 177, 220, 235, 247, 335n10-11, 341n115, 344n180; sociology and, 94, 144, 146, 159-60; state birth and, 21, 217, 219-20, 235, 247, 251; state demise and, 103, 106, 152, 219; state fragments and, 15, 104; as teacher, 87, 94-95, 144-45, 161, 164-65, 170, 3421142; theory of the state, 4-6, 15, 26, 60-61, 87, 92, 94-99, 102, 104, 125, 145, 149, 151-53, 158-62, 165-66, 171, 177, 217, 251, 287, 292n9-10, 294n33, 323n242, 343n146; "three elements" of the state, 4, 217, 292n9; "two sides" theory of, 158-62, 166, 170, 174, 177, 3441180; typologies and, 98-100, 102; United States and, 98, 161, 323n242, 341n120, 341n123; University of Vienna and, 6, 86-87, 92, 94-95, 144-45, 161, 322n225, 323n252, 341n123; Weber and, 4, 146, 336n24; Windelband and, 93, 146-47, 155-57, 335110-11, 339178, 3441180

Japan, 14, 161

[396] INDEX

Jellinek, Paul, 145
Jellinek, Rosalie, 93
Jessup, Philip, 271–72
Jesuits, 70
Johann of Luxemburg, 115
Joseph II, 9, 65, 306n81
Judaism: anti-Semitism, 4, 73–74, 95, 103, 144–45, 252, 314n92; Jellinek and, 4, 74, 92–93, 95, 144–45, 162, 322n225; Jews, 73–74, 92, 95, 162, 223, 314n92; Kelsen and, 162, 223, 363n21
Judson, Pieter, 7, 128–29, 182, 355n78
Jung Wien (Young Vienna), 221
"Jus Gentium' and the Law of Nature in Asia" (Alexandrowicz), 262

Kaizl, Josef, 116 Kallab, Jaroslav, 188 Kalousek, Josef, 114-16, 120-22, 189 Kant, Immanuel: Critique of Pure Reason, 154, 308n5; dual sovereignty and, 93-94; Jellinek and, 26, 93, 146, 148, 153-56, 160, 170, 335nn10-11; neo-Kantianism, 3, 26, 93, 144, 146, 148, 153-57, 160-61, 170, 233, 308n5, 335110, 339167, 339172, 3441180, 364n46; pure theory of law and, 142, 144, 170-71, 335nn10-11, 339n67, 339n72, 340n90, 344n180 Kantorowicz, Ernst, 21, 218 Kapras, Jan, 188 Kasparek, Franciszek, 87 Kaszinca, Jôsef, 88 Kautschitsch, Mathias, 35, 38-39, 41, 44 Kelsen, Adolf, 162, 164 Kelsen, Anna Renata, 223 Kelsen, Auguste, 162 Kelsen, Hans: affect/emotion and, 164-65, 167-68, 177, 243-44; Apponyi and, 365n54; anti-Semitism and, 4, 74, 163, 252; Austro-Marxism and, 223, 252-53, 371n217; background of, 143-44, 162-65; basic norm (Grundnorm) and, 22, 220, 225-31, 289, 301n86, 384n18; Baxi and, 263-64; Bernatzik and, 60, 144, 164-65; Catholicism and, 363n21; circle of, 22, 26, 183, 219-54, 261; collapse of the Habsburg Empire and, 21-22, 26, 142, 181-83, 195, 218-20, 237-54,

268 (see also Habsburg Empire and); "The Conception of State and Social Psychology," 173; constitutional issues and, 4-5, 29, 55, 142, 228-31; Dante and, 163-64; decolonization and, 255-58, 263-64, 268, 270-74, 284, 289, 373n5, 38on136; democracy and, 171, 177, 252-53, 334n3; dreams and, 172, 178; dual sovereignty and, 60, 74, 232; epistemology and, 4-5, 11, 26, 60, 121, 142-44, 153-54, 165-80, 217-54, 287, 345n186; fictional states and, 121; formalism and, 177, 274, 365n52; Freud and, 4, 26, 141, 162-63, 172-76, 221, 223, 334n6, 345n193, 345n198, 346nn204-6, 347n222, 348n239; General Theory of the State, 218; God and, 24, 144, 169, 174-79, 217-19, 227-28, 249, 287-88, 347n209, 347n230, 349n357, 371n208; "God and the State," 174, 347n209, 347nn230-36; Habsburg Empire and, 4-5, 11, 21-22, 26, 60, 74, 121, 141-44, 162-64, 169-70, 173, 178-79, 181-83, 218, 220, 222-23, 228-32, 237-38, 248, 250, 287-89, 365n54; Hayek and, 252; hypostatization and, 170-76; identity thesis and, 168-72, 176; international law and, 4-5, 22, 26, 165, 183, 217-20, 224, 236, 240-51, 255, 258, 261, 268, 271-73, 288, 362112, 3691164, 371n206, 371n208, 373n5; Jellinek and, 4-5, 26, 74, 121, 144, 153-54, 161-62, 164-68, 170-71, 177, 217, 219, 235, 247, 251, 287, 335110-11, 3431146, 344n180, 365n61; Judaism and, 162, 223, 363n21; Kant and, 142, 163, 171, 344n180; Kunz and, 22, 239, 241-42, 246-47, 271, 373n6; legal unity and, 22, 141-42, 168-70, 177-80, 235, 246-48, 287-88, 343n150; Main Problems, 165-66, 168, 223-25, 234, 348n248, 363n24; Marxism and, 334n3, 371n217 (see also Austro-Marxism); Merkl and, 60, 223-25, 233; Mises and, 162, 222, 252; monist framework of, 242-43, 246-47, 250, 271; mythological methodology and, 172-76; neo-Kantianism and, 26, 144, 153-54, 170, 226-27, 233, 335n10, 344n180; new international order and, 26, 181–83, 195, 365nn52–61; oedipal questions and, 165, 173-76, 177-78, 222; Principles of International Law, 255-56; The Problem of Sovereignty, 234, 243; pure theory of law and, 4, 22, 24, 26, 141-44, 161-62, 165-80, 217, 219-54, 287, 334nn2-3; Renner and, 142, 223; Republic of Austria and, 4, 142, 182, 195, 219, 223, 237; Sachs and, 345n198; Sander and, 224-25, 345n193; Schmitt and, 4, 161, 179, 343n149, 349n257, 37on184; Schwarzwald, Eugenie, and, 60, 223; Sein/Sollen (fact/norm) distinction and, 11, 142, 144, 153, 165-70, 177, 220, 247, 288, 335110, 3481241; Shklar and, 289; significance of, 4, 288-89, 334nn2-3; The Sociological and Juridical Conception of the State, 168; sovereignty and, 4-5, 11, 21-22, 24, 142, 166, 168-69, 219-58, 284, 343n149; state birth and death and, 22, 217-58, 268, 270-73, 362nn12, 367n98, 371n213; state-fetishism and, 171; state immortality and, 5, 21-22, 217-18, 249-50, 255-56; state theory and, 168-76, 178, 217-18, 251-52, 255-56, 287; Stufenbau (pyramid of the legal order) and, 22, 224, 233-35, 239, 241, 249, 367n94; substance vs. function and, 171-77; temporality and, 217-18, 255-58, 273, 284, 287-89, 384n18, 384n20; Tezner and, 74, 178-80, 288, 348n248; totems and, 172-76, 274, 346n201, 346n206, 347n222, 347n230; Treaty of Saint-Germain and, 333n167; United States and, 4, 142, 255, 288; University of Vienna and, 4, 141, 162-63, 223-24; Verdross and, 143, 219, 223-25, 230-31, 236-37, 241-42, 246, 248, 271; Voegelin and, 29-30, 228; wartime and, 142, 181-82, 228, 231-37; Weininger and, 163; Wilson and, 181-82 Kelsen, Margarete Bondi, 223-24, 255, 263 Kelsen, Maria Beate, 223 Kennedy, David, 288-89 King's Two Bodies, The (Kantorowicz), 21, 218

INDEX [397]

k. k., 56-58, 181, 222 Kleczyński, Jozef, 90 Kleyle, Karl Ritter von, 32 Klimt, Gustav, 221 Koht, Halvdan, 133-36 Kokoschka, Oskar, 223 Koskenniemi, Martti: The Gentle Civilizer of Nations, 278; international law and, 95, 255, 273, 277-78, 281-82, 378nn94-95; Marek and, 278; Soviet Union and, 277-78, 282 Koselleck, Reinhart, 16, 52, 297n52, 305n63 Krainz, 42, 44 Kramář, Karel: background of, 116; Bohemia and, 26, 103, 116-21, 124, 187-88, 208-11; Czechoslovakia and, 26, 124, 187-88, 208-9, 211, 328n59; Das bömische Staatsrecht, 116; fictional states and, 103, 116-21, 124; new international order and, 187-89, 208-11; Notes on Bohemian Politics, 119; as prime minister, 116; Young Czechs and, 116 Kraus, Karl, 163, 222 Kremsier draft, 29-31, 34, 41, 43-48, 51, 107, 127, 185, 212, 231-32, 236, 304n44; dual sovereignty and, 65; Hein and, 325n18; March constitution and, 29, 47-48, 126-27, 212, 306n83; new international order and, 185, 203, 208, 212; provinces and, 47, 107, 325n18 Krones, Anton, Jr., 363n30 Kun, Bela, 353nn41-42 Kunz, Josef, 22-23, 200, 239-42, 245-49, 256-57, 271, 333n166, 373n6 Kuzmany, Börries, 128, 298n55 Kyslytsy, Sergiy, 280 Laband, Paul, 89, 150, 153, 157, 335n9, 338n46, 339n64 Lammasch, Heinrich, 134, 145, 193, 336n17 Lamp, Karl, 82 La Nation Tchèque journal, 186-87 land law, 228-29, 301n86 land ordinances, 111, 114-19, 122

landowners, 8, 326n38

Lasser, Josef von, 38, 44

Laos, 257

[398] INDEX

Latvia, 200, 280 Laufenstein, Anton, 38 Laun, Rudolf, 133-37, 143, 209, 212 Law and the Algerian Revolution (Bedjaoui), 260 League of Nations, 3, 219, 285; Austrian League of Nations Society and, 333n166; emergence of, 1-2; Fifth Committee, 200; national minorities and, 16, 133-40; new international order and, 193-94, 200, 354n62; Sixth Committee of, 139 Lebanon, 256 "Le Compromis austro-hongrois" (Eisenmann), 13, 195 Leeper, A. W. A., 195 Le Fur, Louis, 67 Legal Nature of State Treaties, The (Jellinek), 95 Legal Nature of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, The (Ulbrich), 100 legal theory: competence-competence attribute and, 229; crisis of juridical cognition and, 237-44; dual sovereignty and, 92, 96-97, 227, 240; inventing origin of law and, 225-28; Jellinek and, 92, 104, 125, 144-62; jungösterreichische Schule and, 224-25, 228, 231-32, 235, 239-52; Kelsen and, 26, 162-80, 217-54, 334n3; legally knowable state creation and, 244-50; Merkl and, 223-25, 232-41, 245, 248, 251, 271; point of departure and, 23, 53, 66, 75, 220, 227-31, 241, 243, 249-50, 265, 270; pure theory of law and, 162-80, 217-54; state birth and, 217-20, 237-84, 369n164; Stufenbau (pyramid of the legal order) and, 224, 233-35, 239, 241, 249, 367n94; world making and, 250-54. See also pure theory of law "Legal Unity of the Austrian State, The" (Merkl), 234-35 Legitimacy of the Modern Age, The (Blumenberg), 24 Leibniz, Gottfried Wilhelm, 94 Lenin, Vladimir, 133 Lentz, Hans, 66 Leopold I, 64 Lesotho, 289 Libya, 256-57

Linnaean system, 102
Locke, John, 171
Lombardy, 32, 50
Loos, Adolf, 222–23
Lower Depths, The (Gorky), 169
Ludwig, 199
Ludwigh, Ernő, 212
Lueger, Karl, 222
Lustkandl, Wenzel: background of, 85;
constitutional issues and, 64–65, 72–73, 83, 85–87; dual sovereignty
and, 63–65, 72, 83, 85–87, 314n91,
319n168; as new breed of expert, 83
Luxemburg, Rosa, 299n65

Macedonia, 134, 280

Mach, Ernst, 171 MacMillans, Margaret, 18 Madagascar, 265 Madras School of Law, 261 Magyars: dual sovereignty and, 68, 71, 80; Hungary and, 17, 68, 71, 185, 309112, 357n112; new international order and, 185, 187, 212 Mahler, Gustav, 222 Mahmud, Tayyab, 289 Maier, Charles, 5 Main Problems of the Theory of Public Law (Kelsen), 165-66, 168, 223-25, 234, 348n248, 363n24 Malfer, Stefan, 108 Manela, Erez, 133 Man without Qualities, The (Musil), 56, 58, 60, 223, 308n5 March constitution, 29, 47-48, 50, 126-27, 212, 306n83 Marczali, Henrik, 54, 69, 101 Marek, Krystyna; Alexandrowicz and, 259, 269, 272, 281; background of, 269; decolonization and, 255, 259, 268-73, 278, 281; Graduate Institute of International Studies and, 269-70; Guggenheim and, 269-70; the Habsburg Empire and, 269, 272; The Identity and Continuity of States in Public International Law, 268-69, 271; Jessup on, 271-72; Kelsen and, 270-72; Koskenniemi and, 278; monist framework of, 271; Nazis and, 272; Poland and, 259, 268-69, 271-73,

INDEX [399]

281; Raczyński and, 269; as refugee, 377n79 Marek, Zygmunt, 269 Maria Theresa, 9; dual sovereignty and, 62, 65; fictional states and, 117-24 Marikar, Naina, 260 Marx, Karl, 17 Marxism: Austro-Marxism 16, 17, 129-33, 252-3, 286, 299n65, 357n99, 363n23, 371n217; Bauer and, 129, 131, 286; Bloch and, 305n63; Engels and, 299n64; Renner and, 129, 286; Rosdolsky and, 299n64 Masaryk, T. G., 116; background of, 186, 351n15; fictional states and, 116; new international order and, 184-90, 197, 208-12, 351115, 352119 Máthé, Gábor, 67 May Day, 222 Mayer, Arno, 16 Mayer, Kajetan, 33-38, 41-43, 107 Mayer, Otto, 158 Mazower, Mark, 285 Merkl, Adolf: Bernatzik and, 60; constitutional issues and, 232, 234-37; discontinuity and, 236, 239; juridical cognition and, 237-41; "The Legal Unity of the Austrian State," 234-35; pluralism and, 236-37; pure theory of law and, 223-25, 232-41, 245, 248, 251, 271; Stufenbau (pyramid of the legal order) of, 224, 233-35, 239, 241, 249, 367n94 Metternich, 32, 40-43, 85 Mexico, 98, 292n16 Mischler, Ernst, 91 Mises, Ludwig von, 16, 162, 222, 252, 298n56, 362n19, 371n213 modernism: avant-garde, 371n208; fiction, 56; legal, 4, 56, 58, 288; pure theory of law and, 4; Young Vienna and, 221 "Mogul Sovereignty and the Law of Nations" (Alexandrowicz), 262 Moldau, 109 monarchy: composite, 7-8, 12-13, 19, 30, 55, 57, 62, 64, 67, 78, 81, 111, 113, 124, 183, 199, 232; constitutional issues and, 7-8, 12-13, 19, 30, 36, 44, 47, 55-59, 62-69, 76-83, 100, 102, 111, 113,

122, 124, 183, 189, 192, 206, 232, 235-36; divine right and, 12, 14, 20, 22-24, 142, 288; dual sovereignty and, 56-59, 62-69, 76-83, 100, 102, 194, 232, 235; elective kingship, 62-64, 115, 187; new international order and, 183, 189, 192, 195, 199, 206; pure theory of law and, 142, 152, 164, 174, 225, 235-36, 287; stranger kings, 63, 115, 187-88. Montenegro, 201, 280, 29218 Moravia, 92, 162; constitutional issues and, 8-9, 34-42, 57, 107, 110-12, 129, 134, 139; dual sovereignty and, 57, 92; new international order and, 187, 189, 193, 196, 208, 211-13 Moravian Compromise, 134, 139 Morgenthau, Hans, 273 Morocco, 269 Mudalair, A. L., 261 multiculturalism, 16 Musil, Robert: dual sovereignty and, 56, 58, 60, 70, 75, 80, 86, 308n5; Kakania humor of, 58; language game of, 58; The Man without Qualities, 56, 58, 60, 223, 308n5; pure theory of law and, 178, 222-23 mythological methodology, 172-76 Namier, Lewis, 198-99, 210 National Liberation Front (FLN), national questions: Austro-Marxism and, 129-33, 299n65; constitutional issues and, 16-18, 31, 32, 35-43, 45, 48-50, 68, 85, 91, 106-7, 124-38, 142, 181, 232, 285-86, 298n56, 317n146,

Issues and, 10–18, 31, 32, 35–43, 45, 48–50, 68, 85, 91, 106–7, 124–38, 142, 181, 232, 285–86, 298n56, 317n146, 325n22, 330n115, 330n133, 333n166–67, 357n99; new international order and, 132–40, 142, 181–82, 184–86, 189, 201–5, 207, 209–13, 215, 232, 333n166–67, 333n172, 357n99; pure theory of law and, 143, 177–78, 227–28, 232, 287 national rights, 16–18, 35, 37–38, 42–43, 49, 124–40, 184, 188, 202, 204, 208, 209, 211; Bauer and, 137; Renner and, 132–34, 137 nationalities as legal entities, 26, 124–40 Nationalities Congress, 333n172

[400] INDEX

nation-states: decolonization and, 18, 259, 270, 284; empire and, 1, 3, 18, 59, 186, 195, 200-201, 253, 259, 284; League of Nations and, 1-3, 16, 133-39, 193-94, 200, 219, 285, 354n62, 381n46; new international order and, 130, 134, 136, 138, 186, 195, 200-202, 357n108, 36on157; organicist theories and, 143 natural law, 14, 23, 144, 225, 234, 288, 292n8 Nazis: fall of, 256; Hitler, 4, 103, 139, 163, 215, 277, 285, 373n5; Marek and, 272 Neo-Kantianism, 13, 308n5, 339n72; Jellinek and, 26, 93, 144, 146, 148, 153-57, 160-61, 170, 335n10-11, 344n180; Kelsen and, 26, 144, 153-54, 170, 226-27, 233, 335n10, 344n180 Nepal, 257 Neue Freie Presse, 158 "New and Original States: The Issue of Reversion to Sovereignty" (Alexandrowicz), 264-65 New International Economic Order, 276 new international order: Allies and, 184, 188, 191, 194-96, 207, 211; annexation and, 185, 202, 207-9, 212, 214; Apponyi and, 190-91, 202, 206, 353nn37-38, 357n99, 365n54; Austria and, 181-82, 185-202, 206-9, 212-13; autonomy and, 185-86, 192-94, 202-3, 206, 209, 211, 213, 355n77; Bauer and, 194, 202; Beneš and, 184-89, 193, 208, 210; Bohemia and, 19, 134, 140, 183, 186-89, 193, 196-97, 199, 207-15, 285; borders and, 189-91, 198-99, 202, 206-15, 285, 351119, 3591125; Britain and, 135, 140, 191, 195-96, 200, 239, 355n79; concept of new state and, 193-201; Croatia and, 196, 201; Czechoslovakia and, 124, 140, 143, 183-96, 199-200, 207-15, 352n34; estates and, 187, 201, 351n10; Francis Joseph and, 185, 187; Galicia and, 196, 207; Habsburg Empire and, 181-216; Headlam-Morley and, 195-200, 210; historical rights and, 18, 124, 183-84, 187-93, 204-16, 285; Hungary and, 183-95, 198-208, 211-15; industry and, 184, 294, 354n55; international law and, 183, 190, 194, 200-201, 205;

Kelsen and, 181-83, 195, 237-54, 365nn52-61; Kramář and, 187-89, 208-11; Kremsier draft and, 185, 203, 208, 212; League of Nations and, 193-94, 200, 354n62; Magyars and, 185, 187, 212; Masaryk and, 184-90, 197, 208-12, 351n15, 352n19; monarchy and, 183, 189, 192, 195, 199, 206; Moravia and, 187, 189, 193, 196, 208, 211-13; New International Economic Order and, 276; occupation and, 209, 213; Ottomans and, 259; paper states and, 185-90; Paris Peace Conference and, 183-92, 195, 200-201, 205-11, 214; positivism and, 182, 190, 219, 225, 228, 231, 234; postimperialism and, 183, 203; Pragmatic Sanction and, 192, 198; prefiguration and, 201–6; provinces and, 190-94, 198, 207-10, 354n55, 357n93; Renner and, 194-95, 202; Romania and, 207; Russia and, 200, 201, 231; self-determination and, 129, 132, 137, 181-82, 184-85, 201-6, 209-12, 357n112; Settlement of 1867 and, 192; Silesia and, 187, 189, 208, 210-13; Slovakia and, 188-89, 208, 211-15; sovereignty and, 181-87, 190-93, 196-208, 211-16; Tezner and, 200; Three Kings Declaration and, 187; Tyrol and, 193, 196, 209 "New States and International Law, The" (Alexandrowicz), 264 New Years Patent, 48 New York Times, 277 Nietzsche, Friedrich, 163 Nigeria, 257 nonterritorial autonomy, 16, 26, 106, 125, 127-32, 134, 202 norms: competence-competence attribute and, 229; constitutional issues and, 48, 55; decolonization and, 270-71; fictional states and, 123, 136; Grundnorm, 22, 220, 225, 301n86, 384n18; inventing origin of law and, 225-28; Jellinek and, 6, 26, 150, 153-60, 166-67, 177, 247; Kelsen and, 24, 26, 55, 142, 166-67, 169, 175-80, 233-34, 247-48, 287-88, 333n167, 343n149, 345n187; point of departure and, 23, 53, 66, 75, 220, 227-31, 241,

INDEX [401]

243, 249–50, 265, 270; pure theory of law and, 142, 149–50, 153–60, 166–67, 169, 175–80; state birth and, 225, 228, 233–36, 246–48, 253. See also Sein/Sollen (fact/norm) distinction "Norms and Natural Laws" (Windelband), 156
Norway, 133, 292n16
Notes on Bohemian Politics (Kramář), 119 occupation: decolonization and, 256, 260, 270–72, 280; dual sovereignty and, 82–83; new international order and, 209, 213
O'Connell, Daniel Patrick, 380n136

October Diploma: constitutional issues and, 29, 53–54, 109–11, 114, 229, 236, 307n121; February Patent and, 29, 111, 229, 307n121; historical-political individuality and, 109–11; Hungary and, 54, 111, 114; Pragmatic Sanction and, 111; pure theory of law and, 229, 236 Olechowski, Thomas, 95, 228 Order of Studies, 84–87 Ormsby-Gore, William, 140

Osterkamp, Jana, 302n91
Ottomans, 98; autonomous provinces of, 284; Habsburg Empire and, 3, 14, 81, 259; intellectuals, 16, 59; new international order and, 185; postimperialism and, 292n8; sovereignty and, 14, 81, 185, 284, 291n7; wreckage of, 259

Pachitch, Nicolas, 201
Pakistan, 16, 59, 256, 289
Palacký, František: absolutism and, 36; constitutional issues and, 28, 31, 33–43, 49–50, 107, 302n7, 330n133; dual sovereignty and, 68; leadership of, 31; national rights and, 124–25, 130, 140; radical alternative of, 38–39 paper states: fictional states and, 106, 114–20, 185–90; new international order and, 185–90
Paris Peace Conference: Austria and, 116, 190–92, 195, 209, 237, 374n17; Czechoslovakia and, 3, 116, 186–89, 191, 209, 360n145; decolonization and, 259–60;

dual sovereignty and, 70; Hungary

and, 70, 116, 190-92, 237, 259, 353n41,

374n17; new international order and, 183-92, 195, 200-201, 205-11, 214; sovereignty and, 3, 183, 191-92, 201, 259 Payment of War Tax (Czechoslovakia) Case, 213 peacemakers, 19, 26, 184, 189, 197-98, 201, 207, 285 peasants, 8-9, 48, 89, 186 Pedersen, Susan, 285, 291n7 Pfretzscher, Norbert, 39 Philosophy of As If, The (Vaihinger), 170 Pillersdorf constitution, 29, 32-33, 47, 235-36, 303n12 Pinkas, Adolf Maria, 35 pluralism, 178; absolutism and, 45-48; collapsing, 45-48; constitutional issues and, 30-31, 37, 51, 54, 124; dual sovereignty and, 57, 61, 91; Ehrlich and, 5, 134, 288; legal implications of, 50-53; Merkl and, 236-37; Merry on, 294n30; postmodern, 128; premodern, 13-14, 57; public authority and, 3; sovereignty and, 3, 7, 10, 11, 13, 15, 21-22, 30-31, 37, 47, 51, 61, 65, 72, 106, 112, 124, 142, 178, 220, 231, 235-36, 241, 249; temporality and, 37, 50-53, 235-36, 296n42 Poland, 2, 256; Alexandrowicz and, 259, 261, 265, 269, 272, 281; Antonwicz and, 281; Britain and, 269; fall of, 261; government-in-exile of, 269; historical rights and, 207; international law and, 264; Marek and, 259, 268-73, 281; national independence movements and, 186 Polanyi, Karl, 12, 295n34 Polish Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 269 Political Theology (Schmitt), 179 Pollock, Sheldon, 104, 207n50 Popper, Karl, 222 positivism: constitutional issues and, 53-55; decolonization and, 262, 265, 267, 272, 376n64; dual sovereignty and, 85, 89, 91-92, 94, 321n199; God and, 14, 85, 89, 144, 148, 225; international law and, 14, 190, 262, 267, knowledge and, 13, 21, 89-92, 144,

147, 171, 231, 267, 272, 287, 3211199;

272, 292n8, 296n46, 362n12, 376n74;

[402] INDEX

positivism (continued)

legal, 13–14, 20–21, 24, 85, 89, 92, 142, 144, 150, 219, 225, 231, 234, 262, 267, 272, 292n8, 321n199, 337n30, 362n12, 364n41; new international order and, 182, 190, 219, 225, 228, 231, 234; psychological, 341n113

postimperialism: decolonization and, 257, 268, 273, 278; dual sovereignty and, 59; fictional states and, 116; international law and, 218–19, 222, 228–30, 237, 239, 242–44, 246, 249–54; Latin America and, 292n8; new international order and, 183, 203; sovereignty and, 3, 18, 23, 181–216, 255–82, 284–86; state birth and, 218–19, 222, 228–30, 237, 239, 242–44, 246, 249–54; temporality and, 255–85

Pragmatic Sanction: constitutional issues and, 9, 51, 54, 62–64, 66, 70–71, 74–76, 103, 111, 119, 198; dual sovereignty and, 62–66, 70–71, 74–76, 320n188; Habsburg Empire and, 9; new international order and, 192, 198

Principles of International Law (Kelsen), 255-56

Problem of Sovereignty, The (Kelsen), 234, 243

"Prospect for a Theory of Nonconceptability" (Blumenberg), 24 provinces: constitutional issues and, 33–44, 47–49, 303n12; dual sovereignty and, 62, 64, 67, 81–82; fictional states and, 104–8, 113–14, 325n18; Kremsier draft and, 47, 107, 325n18; new international order and, 190–94, 198, 207–10, 354n55, 357n93

Prussia, 16, 125, 138

public law, 353n39, 353nn43–44; academic, 82–91, 96, 101, 309n12, 310n31, 318n164; constitutional issues and, 43, 48, 53–54; dual sovereignty and, 57, 63, 65, 71, 73, 82, 309n12, 316n130,; feudal system and, 12; Hungarian, 309n12, 316n130; pure theory of law and, 144, 147, 157–58, 165; sovereignty and, 11–12, 294n33; Staatsrecht, 11, 57, 63, 65, 71, 82–87, 90, 113–23, 131, 165, 187, 211, 223

161, 168-69, 173, 177, 179; basic norm

(Grundnorm) and, 22, 220, 225-31, 233-34, 240-42, 244, 248, 250, 288, 289, 301n86, 364n41, 364n46, 365n52, 367n96, 369n164, 384n18; competencecompetence attribute and, 229; decolonization and, 268-73, 288-89; dualism and, 168, 171, 174-79, 185, 190, 195, 212, 214; epistemological issues and, 141, 143-44, 162-80, 217-54, 337n30; formalism of, 4, 177, 253, 274, 365n52; Freud and, 4, 26, 141, 162-63, 172-76, 237n222, 342nn132-33, 345n193, 346nn199-206, 348n239; Habsburg Empire and, 4-5, 22, 141-44, 161-62, 169-70, 217-54; history of legal thought and, 24; illogical law and, 176-80; imperial collapse and, 22, 217-56; international law and, 4, 22, 26, 217-54; inventing origin of law and, 225-28; jungösterreichische Schule and, 224-25, 228, 231-32, 235, 239-52; Kant and, 142, 144, 146, 148, 153-63, 170-71, 335nn10-11, 339n67, 339n72, 340n90, 344n180; Kelsen and, 4-5, 22, 24, 26, 141-44, 161-80, 217, 220, 223-28, 234, 245, 248-53, 334nn2-3; legally knowable state creation and, 244-50; legal modernism and, 4, 56, 58, 288; legal unity and, 22, 141-42, 168-70, 177-80, 235, 246-48, 287-88, 343n150; monarchy and, 142, 152, 164, 174; Musil and, 178; mythological methodology and, 172-76; norms and, 142, 149-50, 153-60, 166-67, 169, 175-80; organicist theories and, 143; pluralism and, 178 (see also pluralism); point of departure and, 23, 53, 66, 75, 220, 227-31, 241, 243, 249-50, 265, 270; Schmitt and, 161, 179; Sein/Sollen distinction and, 11, 142, 144, 153, 165-70, 177, 220, 247, 288, 335n10, 348n241; state birth and, 217-20, 231-57, 270-71; state theory and, 168-76, 178, 217-18, 251-52, 255-56, 287; Stufenbau (pyramid of the legal order) and, 224, 233-35, 239, 241, 249, 367n94; Tezner and, 178-80, 348n248; totems and, 172-76, 274, 346n201, 346n206, 347n222, 347n230; world making and, 250-54 Putin, Vladimir, 17, 299n66

INDEX [403]

quasi sovereignty, 13, 15, 67, 104, 191, 296n44 Queen Elisabeth Hotel, 61 Question of Nationalities and Social Democracy, The (Bauer), 129 Raczyński, Edward, 269 Rao, T. S. Rama, 265 Ratz, Johann Kasper, 36 Rechberg, Count, 51 recognition of states, 61, 186, 199, 205, 210, 219, 242-43, 246, 260, 264, 267-69, 292n8, 301n85, 361n9, 377n65 Redlich, Josef, 34, 82-83, 296n46, 304n44 Redslob, Robert, 82, 104-5 Red Vienna, 252 Reichsrat (imperial council), 108-9, 111, 123, 187 Renner, Karl: accuses Allies, 137; Bauer and, 129; juridical persons and, 129-32; Kelsen and, 142, 223; Marxism and, 129, 286; national rights and, 132-34, 137, 286; new international order and, 194-95, 202; The Self-Determination of Nations with Particular Application to Austria, 130; state birth and, 223, 237 Responsibility to Protect doctrine, 259 Rieger, František, 37, 43-44 Romania, 17, 261, 269; dual sovereignty and, 68; independence and, 257, 292n8; Kremsier draft and, 127; national rights and, 127-29, 134; new international order and, 134, 207 Roman law, 127, 157 Rosdolsky, Roman, 299n64 Roth, Joseph, 222 Russia, 3, 79, 125, 161, 231; czarist, 239, 29117; end of the Cold War and, 277-80; Gorbachev and, 277; Hungary and, 61; invasion of Ukraine, 279-80; Kramář and, 116; new international order and, 201; Putin and, 17, 299n66; United Nations and, 280; Yeltsin and, 277, Ruthenians, 17, 45, 193, 207, 215

Sachs, Hans, 345n198 Sahlins, Marshall, 63, 115

Salzburg, 36, 38-39, 109, 193

Sander, Fritz, 224-25, 233, 238-39, 247-49, 271, 345n193; troubled relationship with Kelsen and, 224-25, 249 Savigny, Carl Friedrich von, 85, 143 Schennach, Martin, 64-65 Schiele, Egon, 222 Schlick, Moritz, 222 Schmitt, Carl: Kelsen and, 161, 179, 343n149, 349n257, 37on184; as Nazi, 4; political theology and, 20, 23, 179-80, 349n260; sovereignty and, 20, 23, 161; Tezner and, 349n260 Schmitt, Richard, 337n30 Schnitzler, Arthur, 221 Scholl, 39, 45 Schönberg, Arnold, 222-23 Schopenhauer, Arthur, 94, 163, 172 Schorske, Carl, 177, 222, 362n16 Schuselka, Franz, 28-29, 49, 55 Schwarzwald, Eugenie (Genia), 60, 223 Schwarzwald, Hermann, 223 Scotland, 63, 355n79 Scott, James Brown, 341n120 self-determination: Bohemia and, 119-20; decolonization and, 23, 266-67, 273; historical rights and, 119-20, 184, 203-5, 212; inside empire, 119-20, 130, 132; legal problem of, 19, 184, 267-68; new international order and, 129, 132, 137, 181-82, 184-85, 201-6, 209-12, 357n112; prefiguration and, 201-6; sovereignty and, 19, 23, 299n65 Self-Determination of Nations with Particular Application to Austria, The (Renner), 130 self-government, 44, 67, 107, 202 Serbia, 35, 185, 196, 201-2, 272, 280, 292n8 Seton-Watson, R. W., 12, 186 Settlement of 1867 (Ausgleich), 13, 16; constitutional issues and, 30, 54; dual sovereignty and, 12, 26, 29, 56-83, 86, 96, 100, 232; estates and, 295n37; feudal system and, 59; fictional states and, 104, 113, 124, 327n44; Kelsen and, 232, 365n54, 366n85; Law 1867:XII and, 66; new international order and, 192; point of departure and, 228; vanishing empire and, 69-74 Sex and Character (Weininger), 163

[404] INDEX

Sheehan, James, 17 Should Great Britain Go to War—for Czechoslovakia? An Appeal to British Common Sense for the Sake of World Peace (Slovak Council), 215 Silesia: constitutional issues and, 36, 38, 41; fictional states and, 107, 109; new international order and, 187, 189, 208, 210-13 Silvester Patent, 48 Sinn Fein, 59 Skinner, Quentin, 21 Slovak Council, 215 Slovakia, 2; constitutional issues and, 39; Hungary and, 39, 189, 208, 211-12, 360n151; Magyars and, 17; new international order and, 188-89, 208, 211-15 Slovenia, 2, 277, 280, 381n143 Smolka, Franciszek, 34 Smuts, Jan, 193 Social Science Research Council, 215 Socio-ethical Meaning of Justice, Injustice, and Punishment, The (Jellinek), 94 Sociological and Juridical Conception of the State (Kelsen), 168 Somalia, 257 sovereignty: aristocracy, 10, 17, 51, 54, 61, 70, 73, 89, 108, 116-17; autonomy and, 1, 25-26, 44, 52, 57, 59, 81, 104-6, 130, 132, 138, 193, 211, 229, 274, 284; Bohemia and, 12-13, 22, 26, 43, 80, 103, 105, 109, 117, 120, 140, 183, 196, 199, 211, 213, 220, 286; centralization and, 7-10, 13-15; confronting mortal, 237-44; crisis of juridical cognition and, 237-44; Czechoslovakia and, 3, 17, 26, 124, 140, 184, 187, 191, 193, 196, 211, 213-14, 256, 265, 277, 286; decolonization and, 255-82, 375n27, 375n30, 375n33, 375n38, 376n62; dual, 56-102 (see also dual sovereignty); epistemological issues and, 5, 10, 20-27, 166, 258, 266-71, 283-84; feudal system and, 11-12, 44, 59, 108-12, 118, 184, 191, 295n35, 311n39; Geertz on, 104; Habsburg Empire and, 2, 5-7, 11-13, 15-20, 22, 26, 30-32, 34, 36, 43-45, 47-49, 52-53, 59, 67, 72, 76-81, 89, 91-92, 96-99, 104-6, 142, 183, 185,

Seychelles, 289

192, 196-200, 220, 229-32, 253-54, 284-86, 294n33, 301n85; of the Habsburg Empire's component lands, 36, 44, 48, 57-59 61-62, 67-68, 71, 75, 78, 81, 112, 117-20, 229; historical priority and, 259-66; Hungary and, 12-15, 18, 56, 61, 67-68, 71, 75, 96, 98, 109, 117, 183, 185, 190-93, 199, 220, 230, 254, 259, 284–86; immortality and, 5, 21, 23-24, 217-20, 237-50, 255-56, 283-84; India and, 20, 132, 260-64, 284; League of Nations and, 1-3, 16, 133-39, 193-94, 200, 219, 285, 354n62, 381n46; as limit concept, 20; logical priority and, 266-77; as manybodied problem, 6–9; new international order and, 181-87, 190-93, 196-208, 211-54; Ottomans and, 14, 81, 185, 284, 291n7; parcellized, 8; Paris Peace Conference and, 3, 183, 191-92, 201, 259; personal, 106; postimperial, 3, 18, 23, 181-216, 255-82, 284-86, ; public law and, 11-12, 294n33; quasi, 13, 15, 67, 104, 191, 296n44; residual, 16, 19, 114-20; self-government and, 44, 67, 107, 202; state birth and, 219-20, 225, 228-54; statehood and, 2, 5, 15, 61, 63, 67-68, 76, 81, 97-98, 104, 109, 183, 191, 249, 258-59, 281, 284, 286-87, 294n33, 325n15, 361n9; temporality and, 5, 14, 20-23, 25, 171-24, 183, 188-201, 217-20, 235-39, 241, 244-50, 255-89 Soviet Union, 16; breakup of, 277-82; decolonization and, 256, 272, 277-82, 377n79; Koskenniemi on, 277-78, 282; new order and, 200-201; UN Security Council and, 280 Spain, 75, 269 Springer, Anton, 33 SS Washington, 4, 255 Staatsrecht: Bohemian, 113-22; constitutional issues and, 11; dual sovereignty and, 57, 63, 65, 71, 82-87, 90; fictional states and, 113-23, 131; new international order and, 187, 211; pure theory of law and, 165; state birth and, 223. See also historical rights

Stadion, Franz, 46–47, 305n79

State and Nation (Renner), 129

INDEX [405]

sultanates, 1 state birth: Austria and, 182-85, 193-200, 219, 222-23, 228-31, 234-37, 246-47, Sweden, 98, 205, 292n16 252-53; Bauer and, 237; Bohemia Switzerland, 6, 49, 96, 186 and, 183, 186-88, 196, 199, 207, 209, Syatauw, J. J. G., 273 211, 213-14, 220, 228, 235-36; crisis Syria, 256 of juridical cognition and, 237-44; System der subjektiven öffentlichen Rechte Czechoslovakia and, 124, 183, 185-90, (Jellinek), 147 245, 250; epistemological issues and, Szécsen, Antal, 51-52, 108-9, 123 217-20, 237-84, 369n164; Hungary and, 192-93, 237, 259, 272, 365n54; Tangiers, 269 international law and, 217-20, 224, Teleki, Pál, 191 236, 239-84; Jellinek and, 21, 217, Temperley, Harold, 200 219-20; Kelsen and, 217-56, 362nn12, Textbook of Austrian Constitutional Law 367n98, 371n213; Kunz and, 239-42, (Ulbrich), 90 245-49; legal theory and, 217-20, Tezner, Friedrich, 383n15; dual sovereignty 237-84, 369n164; Merkl and, 223-25, and, 65, 73-79, 82-84, 102, 314n91; 232-41, 245, 248, 251; post empire fictional states and, 122-23; illogical and, 218-19, 222, 228-30, 237, 239, law and, 179; Kelsen and, 74, 178-80, 242-44, 246, 249-54; pure theory 288, 348n248; logical-doctrinal method and, 102; as new breed of expert, 83; of law and, 217-20, 231-57, 270-71; resurrected states and, 256-57, 281, new order and, 200; pure theory of law and, 178-80, 348nn237-48; Stoerk 286; sovereignty and, 217-20, 225, 228-84; Stufenbau (pyramid of the and, 102 legal order) and, 224, 233-35, 239, 241, Theory of State Unions, The (Jellinek), 92, 249, 367n94; temporality and, 217-18, 95, 145 236, 245, 249, 254-84; Verdross and, Theory of the Modern State (Jellinek), 159 219, 223-25, 230-31, 236-37, 240-42, Third World Approaches to International Law, 262 246-49, 364n35, 367n98 Three Kings Declaration, 187 state death, 22-23, 103-6, 110-24, 193-Thun-Hohenstein, Count von, 83-85, 200, 217-18, 237-51, 255-57 state fragments, 15, 104 318n164, 319n178 Statistik, 86-87, 311n32 Tisza, 109 Steed, Henry Wickham, 186 Togo, 257 Steinacker, Harold, 81 Toman, Hugo, 114-16, 120, 122, 189 Stoerk, Felix, 101-2 Torres Strait Islander Peoples, 266 Stöger-Steiner, Rudolf, 181-82 totems, 172-76, 274, 346n201, 346n206, Stone, Julius, 264 347n222, 347n230 Stourzh, Gerald, 68, 79, 128, 297n60, Transkei, 289 Transleithania, 57-58, 295n38 330n115 Strisower, Leo, 163 Transylvania, 2, 67, 127, 207 Stubenrauch, Moriz von, 83, 85 Treaty of Berlin, 82 Stufenbau (pyramid of the legal order), Treaty of Saint-Germain, 19, 194, 237, 224, 233-35, 239, 241, 249, 367n94 333n167, 356n87, 373n5 Styria, 36, 41-42, 47, 57, 107, 193, 196, Troeltsch, Ernst, 154 Tunisia, 257 Turkey, 59, 187, 200, 256 succession: dynastic, 9, 30, 62-64; state, "two sides" theory: epistemological per-3, 19, 23, 200, 219, 238, 245, 259, 268, spective of, 159, 170; Jellinek and, 272-76, 278-79, 281, 355n79, 356n83, 361n4, 378n100, 380n136 158-62, 166, 170, 174, 177, 3441180; Sudan, 257 rearrangement of, 161

[406] INDEX

Tyrol, 9, 111; constitutional issues and, 36, 39, 42; dual sovereignty and, 62; new international order and, 193, 196, 209; Verdross and, 231

Uganda, 289 Ukraine, 2, 17, 277-80, 299n64, 299n66, 381n146

Ulbrich, Josef, 65, 73, 90-92, 100, 158, 295n40, 309n12, 321n195-205; background of, 90; Kremsier parliament and, 65; The Legal Nature of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, 100

United Nations, 1, 219, 381n143; Alexandrowicz and, 261; Charter of, 280; Commission on Human Rights, 266; Secretary General, 278–79; Security Council, 278–80; Sixth Committee of, 259; state mortality and, 257; Ukraine and, 280

United States: Apponyi and, 190; Baxi and, 263; Jászi and, 215; Jellinek and, 98, 161, 323n242, 341n120, 341n123; Kelsen and, 4, 142, 255, 288; Kunz and, 256, 333n166; Laun and, 209; Ormsby-Gore on, 140; state autonomy in, 57; Voegelin and, 29; Wilson and, 133, 181-82, 202-4, 207, 209-10, 3411123 universal knowledge, 158-62

Vacano, Emil, 35, 37-38, 43 Vaihinger, Hans, 170 Verdross, Alfred: decolonization and, 268, 271; Kelsen and, 143, 219, 223-25, 230-31, 236-37, 241-42, 246, 248, 271; monist framework of, 271; nationality law and, 138-39; new international order and, 200; pure theory of law and, 143, 219, 223-25, 230-31, 236-37, 240-42, 246-49, 364n35, 367n98 Verdross, Ignaz, 231-32 Vienna Circle of logical empiricism, 222 Vienna Convention on Succession of

States in Respect of State Property,

Archives and Debts, 278-79 of States in Respect of Treaties, 278-79 Vienna Psychoanalytic Association, Visscher, Charles de, 219 Voegelin, Eric, 29-30, 228

Voralberg, 193

Vienna Convention on Succession

Walter, Robert, 228 "War Germs in the Danube Basin" (Jászi), 215 Watson, Irene, 266 Weber, Max, 4, 146, 336n24 Weininger, Otto, 163

Wellesz, Egon, 223 Wiener Juristische Gesellschaft, 127 Wilson, Woodrow, 341n123; American peace and, 202; Apponyi and, 202; Kelsen and, 181-82; liberal internationalism of, 133; new international order and, 181-82, 202-4, 207-10; self-determination and, 203

Windelband, Wilhelm, 93-94, 146-47, 155-57, 335110-11, 339178, 3441180; "Norms and Natural Laws," 156

Wissenschaft: dual sovereignty and, 87-88, 90, 93, 94, 99-100; des Judentums movement and, 93; legal theory and, 246-47

Wittgenstein, Ludwig, 163, 222, 252 Wlassics, Gyula, 203-6 World Post Union, 80

Yelstin, Boris, 277, 279 Young Czechs, 116, 3301133 Yugoslavia, 207, 272, 280 Yurchak, Alexei, 278

Zaghlūl, Sa'd, 133 Zahra, Tara, 7, 128 Zichy, Theodore, 78 Ziemialkowski, Florian, 37 Žolger, Ivan, 70 Zweig, Stefan, 221-22