

CONTENTS

Introduction: Two Roads to Rio	1
1 The “New Abolitionists”: The Politics of Prostitution in the Late Nineteenth Century	16
2 Purifying Empire: India, the Philippines, and the War of 1898	43
3 “War on the White Slave Traffic”: Constructing Sexual Citizenship in the Early Twentieth Century	72
4 Policing Women, Protecting Soldiers: The American Plan on the World War I Home Front	103
5 The Caribbean Laboratory: The American Plan and US Empire	136
6 A “Righteous Crusade”: Testing the American Plan in France	168
7 “A World-Wide Influence”: Americans and the League of Nations	197
Conclusion	232

Acknowledgments 241

Notes 247

Index 313

Introduction

TWO ROADS TO RIO

MARIE FRANÇOISE Yvonne Biaggioni felt a wave of relief as she stepped onboard the SS Valdivia on the evening of April 30, 1924. As the spire of Marseille’s Notre-Dame de la Garde Basilica faded into the darkening sky, she reflected on her escape. A ballet dancer, she earned only a limited and insecure income which she sometimes supplemented by selling sex, both in her home of Marseille as well as elsewhere in France. But her boyfriend “abused her and took her money,” and so, like many young French women in the aftermath of the First World War, she left home.¹

Biaggioni was not the only member of her family to do so. Her younger sister had departed France at age 15 to seek employment in Russia, Egypt, Italy, Spain, and Germany, working as an “Oriental dancer” and sleeping with men “to make extra money.” After the war, economic devastation pressed many people to migrate and earn money however they could.² In Biaggioni’s family, at least three and likely all four sisters exchanged erotic and sexual labor for money, security, and survival.

Crossing the Atlantic, Biaggioni knew she would miss her family, especially the 2-year-old girl she called her “adopted daughter”—a term unmarried women often used to avoid the stigma that fell on children conceived out of wedlock. But she knew the money she could earn abroad could change their lives. While she had initially planned to go to Buenos Aires, Argentina, she learned that immigration officials there would not admit women who had previously sold sex. So Biaggioni settled on Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, where there were “less difficulties placed in a woman’s way.”

As the ship crossed the Atlantic, Biaggioni subsidized her voyage through sexual exchange. She had sex with several men on the ship, including the purser, who changed her cabin at no cost. A slim, 5'4" woman with "reddish hair," Biaggioni looked younger than her 36 years (though we cannot be sure she gave officials on the ship her real age). Upon arriving in Rio on May 16, 1924, Biaggioni immediately set about making money at a pención, or brothel, in the Lapa neighborhood, a bohemian entertainment district where the authorities tolerated commercial sex.

White French women like Biaggioni commanded higher prices and were subjected to less police surveillance and harassment than Afro-Brazilian and Eastern European Jewish women. French women were particularly in demand for practicing "perversion," slang for oral sex.³ Biaggioni spent most evenings going out to casinos, where she ate, drank, watched the entertainment, and picked up clients. She frequently entertained "high officials, such as members of the Staff of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Police Delegate of this District, and others of high rank," some of whom kept regular appointments with her.

While Biaggioni paid 70 mil reis (approximately 7 US dollars) a day to the madam for room and board, she earned around 200 mil reis (approximately 20 US dollars) a day, leaving her plenty of money to open a "nice savings account" at the Italo-French Bank of Brazil. She regularly sent money back to France to support her family and "adopted" daughter. But she also harbored more ambitious plans. Using the ship's purser on the SS Valdivia to pass messages, Biaggioni sent for her sisters Charlotte, age 25, and Pauline, age 20, and included money for their passage. She planned to "open a pención herself," where she and her sisters could keep all their earnings. After several years, they would all return to France "with a great deal of money saved up."

On July 12, 1924, an American visited the brothel not to purchase sex, but to spy on its dwellers and to learn all he could about the inner working of the vice economy. Tall, with a medium build, brown hair, and brown eyes, he looked to be in his early thirties.⁴ We do not know what name he gave, but it was certainly not his real one, Paul Michael Kinsie. He examined the physiognomy of the women and listened to the languages they spoke. In New York-accented English, or perhaps a few words of broken French, he may have chatted with a few of the women and the brothel owner. As he could only speak English and Yiddish, he often had to rely on his observations and instincts—or, perhaps, biases—rather than conversations.

When Kinsie and Biaggioni met, she did not give her real first name, presenting herself as Yvonne Françoise, her middle names. Kinsie soon took his leave and moved on to another brothel—or maybe he stayed longer with one of the women; the record is silent. When he got back to his hotel, he wrote a report on his findings, signed only with the number 70, to assure that his identity remained concealed.

Did Biaggioni believe the story Kinsie told her? Perhaps he posed as a prospective client or said he wanted to place one of his “girls” at the brothel, or promised to take her to Buenos Aires, where she could make more money. Yet Biaggioni may have found Kinsie suspicious. Indeed, she may have already caught wind of the League of Nations study on the “traffic in women,” and suspected Kinsie, as well as another man she spoke with on the SS Valdivia, of working as undercover investigators.

To League investigators, Biaggioni appeared doubly suspicious. She traveled from her home country to another to sell sex, making her a potential trafficking victim. But because she planned to send for her sisters—one of whom was under 21 years old, and thus, according to League officials, unable to consent to prostitution—Biaggioni was also a potential trafficker.⁵

Kinsie’s journey to Rio took a very different route than Biaggioni’s. Born in New York City in 1893, Kinsie grew up in a Jewish family in the Chelsea neighborhood. The 1915 Census listed him as a hat salesman who worked for the family business.⁶ But as early as 1913, at just 20 years old, Kinsie also worked as an undercover investigator attempting to root out prostitution in American cities.⁷

In the early twentieth century, reform-minded private citizens and public officials in many American cities worried about the pervasiveness and visibility of prostitution, particularly the red-light districts where police informally tolerated commercial sex, often located in African American and immigrant neighborhoods or just outside the city limits. The American Social Hygiene Association (ASHA), an organization headquartered in Kinsie’s hometown of New York City, took the lead in this work. With funding from billionaire businessman and philanthropist John D. Rockefeller, Jr., the ASHA sent its agents around the country to investigate vice districts and stamp them out. Kinsie soon became one of the organization’s most valuable employees.

Kinsie possessed a remarkable ability to dissemble. He could pose as a client or pimp to get the measure of a red-light district. He could easily strike up conversations with young women, flirt with them, and get them to reveal information about the commercial sex industry and their place within it. He also misled officials. During one 1913 investigation in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, Kinsie lied in a sworn affidavit while describing his findings in the city and gave his age as 24, perhaps to increase his credibility.⁸ Although he claimed to have a college degree from the University of Kentucky, there is no record of him graduating.⁹

When the United States entered the First World War, Kinsie's investigative career took off. He joined the US Army and worked for a special division run by ASHA personnel, which rewrote US military prostitution policy, criminalized prostitution in most states, and helped arrest tens of thousands of women. After crossing the country to eradicate prostitution near military training camps, Kinsie traveled to France to conduct investigations in the aftermath of the armistice, which led to the harassment and arrest of women there. While the war may have been devastating for French women like Biaggioni, making it both more difficult to marry and to eke out a living on their own, it offered an opportunity for the ASHA and its star investigator to spread the anti-prostitution gospel.

In 1923, the League of Nations—the international governing body formed at the war's end—resolved to investigate the international dimensions of the traffic in women. Even though the United States declined to join the League, the League's trafficking committee selected Americans from the ASHA, the self-proclaimed world experts on prostitution, to take the lead. For the ASHA, an international investigation of trafficking provided the perfect pretext to spread American-style policy around the globe, particularly criminalizing commercial sex and curbing the migration of people deemed sexually immoral. As the most trusted and prolific investigator for the ASHA, Kinsie spent three years traversing the Atlantic, roaming Europe, crisscrossing the Americas, and searching for trafficked women in North Africa. In most places he posed as a trafficker to infiltrate the international trafficking rings the League believed were operating. He recorded his conversations and observations from sixty cities across four continents and shared this data with his ASHA colleagues, who compiled it into a final report to present to the League's Committee on Traffic in Women and Children.

Kinsie and his colleagues furnished the League with crucial data for conceptualizing and defining trafficking. "There is a constant stream of foreign women proceeding to certain countries," the final report declared. This "stream" itself provided evidence that "a traffic of considerable dimensions is being carried on."¹⁰

Their investigation imprinted a particularly American vision of trafficking on the League of Nations' anti-trafficking work, one that understood all women's migration for sexual labor as trafficking. And the final report, full of the supposed hard data extracted through the undercover investigative process, supported the American viewpoint. These definitions and data formed the basis of international agreements in the 1930s, which defined all prostitution as forced trafficking. The solution to the problem of trafficking, then, involved criminalizing commercial sex and limiting migration, policies framed as a means of protecting women.

How should we understand these two roads to Rio? According to the League's trafficking investigators, prostitution endangered not only Biaggioni, but the moral and physical health of the world. But in the eyes of women like Biaggioni, violent partners, economic precarity, police harassment, and difficulty migrating often posed more pressing dangers than the act of sexual exchange itself. In fact, while Kinsie surely saw himself as part of a prestigious scientific and policymaking community that rescued women around the world, Biaggioni had reason to see his work as nefarious. After all, Kinsie and his ASHA colleagues laid the foundation for policies that entrapped women, deprived them of customers, surveilled them, prevented them from traveling, and made it hard for them to earn a living, even in locales with legal commercial sex industries.

In the end, as this book will show, Kinsie's view won out—we still live with it today. But it is crucial to learn as much as we can from women like Biaggioni. Their archival traces reveal the structural constraints, the everyday dilemmas, and the strategies of mutual aid and creative resistance that shaped women's migration, labor, and lives.¹¹ From Kinsie's vantage, such factors remained largely irrelevant or invisible.

American Sexual Exceptionalism

In the 1870s, a group of British anti-slavery and women's rights activists began to attack what was a fairly ubiquitous mode of prostitution control in many European countries and their colonies in the nineteenth century. Under this policy regime, termed réglementation by the French officials who developed it, and "regulationism" or "regulation" in English, governments tolerated and oversaw the commercial sex industry by licensing brothels and registering prostitutes, whom physicians regularly examined for venereal disease.¹² These British activists, soon joined by their brethren on the Continent and in the United States, termed their movement "abolition" and themselves "new abolitionists," to signal their desire to abolish state-regulated prostitution, just as governments had abolished chattel slavery. Reformers also adopted the phrase "social purity" to describe their goal of purifying society from sexual ills.¹³

At first, this transatlantic abolitionism had a distinctly feminist bent. Its adherents argued that state-regulated prostitution both caused and resulted from women's political, social, and economic inequality, which any real solution to the problem of prostitution would have to address.¹⁴ The feminist abolitionist position rejected licensed prostitution because it infringed on women's civil liberties and constituted state overreach.¹⁵ The state-regulated brothel, they argued, was the primary driver of sex trafficking, the forced transport of women for forced prostitution. But by the late nineteenth century, another group who opposed regulated prostitution increasingly gained power in the United States and Europe. These "paternalist abolitionists," to use Jessica Pliley's term, hoped to abolish regulation not because it harmed women, but because it encouraged prostitution and immorality. They also argued, as feminists did, that regulation caused sex trafficking. Impelled by concerns over disease and crime, however, they worked to replace state-regulated prostitution with "laws that targeted 'bad' women while also treating women as children."¹⁶ Unlike their feminist predecessors, they stressed carceral, rather than economic and political solutions to the "problem" of prostitution.

In the early twentieth century, a group of American reformers took the logic of paternalist abolitionism even further. While Americans initially had worked as junior partners to the British, as the United States gained power on the world stage they also gained power to shape the international fight against prostitution and trafficking. Under the banner of "social hygiene," they continued to reject state-licensed prostitution, but as a part of a larger platform to eradicate prostitution and the prostitute herself.¹⁷ Much like Americans who advocated for the federal prohibition of alcohol and opium in the early twentieth century, these prostitution prohibitionists saw the federal government, particularly the US military, as their most powerful ally.¹⁸ They pushed for laws that criminalized and prohibited commercial sex, as well as immigration restrictions that made supposedly sexually suspicious migrants subject to exclusion and deportation. And they succeeded, passing laws prohibiting prostitution in the 1910s that remain on the books and continue to be enforced. Indeed, the United States has been a global outlier in its insistence on prohibition as a policy approach and its tolerance for creating criminals through criminalizing acts, identities, and substances it deems immoral.¹⁹

As they attacked commercial sex, Americans developed a strong sense of what I term sexual exceptionalism, that is, the belief that American national character was rooted in—and visible through—the superior sexual morality of the people and their government. The term links the ideology of American exceptionalism to the concept of "sex exceptionalism," that is, that American culture, as well as law, have treated sex as essentially and categorically distinct from other aspects of human life. Its proponents articulated American sexual exceptionalism through multiple idioms, including the racial language of Anglo-Saxon bloodlines, medical discourses about low rates of venereal disease, religious claims about Protestant Christian sexual reserve, and political arguments about the sexual self-control necessary for democratic self-governance. Debates over prostitution and trafficking buttressed broader national narratives about American exceptionalism. As David Bell notes, “political narratives about America’s exceptional character served to justify various projects of national aggression against both Native and foreign peoples, but they also highlighted what Americans saw as their best qualities and their moral duties, giving them a standard to live up to.”²⁰ Reforming prostitution policy at home and abroad were thus two sides of the same coin.

Recent scholarship has shown the value of bringing together the histories of sexuality and statecraft, illuminating how delineating and policing normative sexual arrangements has expanded the reach of local and state governments, as well as the US federal government.²¹ Empire of Purity examines how the state came to recognize, define, and act on the “problem” of commercial sex. It traces how the US government increasingly circumscribed normative heterosexual intercourse in the decades before—and concurrently with—the period when it also constructed a homosexual-heterosexual binary in federal policy.²² As scholars have shown, policing prostitution and trafficking created new federal bureaucracies such as the FBI, restructured urban geographies, reinforced gendered and racial hierarchies, and strengthened colonial rule.²³

Yet the wide-reaching goals and effects of US anti-prostitution and trafficking efforts, I argue, are only visible by following actors and policies as they crossed borders.²⁴ I trace the exercise of US power across multiple kinds of jurisdictions, from the US mainland, to US territories, occupations, and even other sovereign states. In doing so, a new picture emerges, one that illuminates both the workings of US power and the ideological construction of normative heterosexuality. By focusing on sexuality while attending to gender and race, the book pursues a different kind of “Atlantic crossings” of progressive reform, one in which Americans did not simply adopt European policies, but actively tried to shape them.²⁵

This expansion of US power occurred not only through the spread of American ideology, as scholars have suggested of America’s “moral empire,” but also through direct attempts to shape and enforce policy in other places—both colonies and sovereign states. At times, US prostitution policy followed the model of the “colonial boomerang,” as US officials first tested policies in colonies and then applied them on the mainland.²⁶ Yet at other times, US officials first implemented mainland policies in one colonial test case and then elsewhere outside of the mainland. While other scholars have revealed the US government's interest in regulating sexual contacts between US soldiers and local women, Empire of Purity demonstrates the expansive and interconnected nature of American reformers' efforts, which were not limited to one imperial site but reflected their global ambitions.²⁷

Moreover, US prostitution policy was forged through entanglements with other imperial powers. These transimperial encounters reflected the fact that just as countries interact, so do imperial formations, which include both state and non-state actors.²⁸ Americans had long looked to the British Empire to make sense of their own imperial ambitions and anxieties.²⁹ In the late nineteenth century, a trans-Atlantic cadre of abolitionists attempted to close British imperial regulated brothels in India, while also calling on US cities not to adopt regulation. After 1898, US officials embraced Spanish imperial forms of regulated prostitution in the Philippines, while an American and European reform network criticized them. France and the United States, both imperial powers during WWI, battled over which country had the more scientific and civilized prostitution policy. And in the post-WWI moment, debates over prostitution policy at the League of Nations were also about how empires should properly govern.

Empire of Purity brings together the insight that public-private partnerships have fueled the expansion of state power, with an interest in zooming the lens out beyond the nation-state.³⁰ It demonstrates that partnerships between the state and private philanthropic organizations dedicated to eradicating prostitution and trafficking extended the US government's role in the sexual lives of its citizens as well as those who found themselves under its governance around the globe. In fact, such public-private partnerships could advance US policy interests in international governance even in the absence of explicit US state involvement. ASHA members, for example, promoted an American-style prohibitionist prostitution policy at the League of Nations, even as they did not officially represent the United States.

Americans' ambition to spread sexual morality abroad intertwined with their avowed commitment to expanding liberty: proper sexual governance paved the way for the success of democratic political forms. Although by WWI Americans often made the connections between sex and democracy explicit, prior to it they more often used the language of civilization. Leaders of private reform organizations, and, by the turn of the century, the US state, promoted sexual self-control for men and women as the cornerstone of civilization.

Civilizational ideology integrated anxieties about race, gender, sexuality, national identity, religion, and class into a unified, hierarchical continuum that allowed for the ranking of individuals and peoples.³¹

While nineteenth-century Americans employed the language of civilization to claim a status equal to European nations, by the twentieth century they used it to justify American global power.³² Unsurprisingly, Americans with social, political, and economic clout positioned those like themselves—white, male, American, Protestant, and middle-class—at the top. Reform-minded white women forged their own claims to power by arguing for women’s inherently civilized natures—more civilized even than white men—because of women’s lack of and ability to control sexual impulses.³³

Yet, these activists believed, civilizational hierarchies were not completely fixed. Individuals and peoples could move between the stages. With the proper tutelage uncivilized peoples could move forward; but if corrupted by vices, and particularly sexual vices, civilized peoples could move backward. A government that regulated or tolerated prostitution encouraged physical and mental degeneration among its citizenry, a sure path to national decline. Moreover, anti-prostitution activists argued, the problem of prostitution could extend beyond national borders: through trafficking, sexual vice in any part of the world could infect the United States. The efforts of American private reform organizations and US state officials to shape prostitution and trafficking policy abroad could also thus protect the United States itself.

US officials and private reform organizations drew on the growing moral authority of humanitarianism in their quest to disseminate American sexual laws and mores abroad. Many scholars have noted the imperial roots of humanitarianism and humanitarian interventions, often based on upholding the supposedly universal moral values that governed civilized societies.³⁴ Here again, US officials and private-citizen reformers argued for American sexual exceptionalism. For much of the nineteenth century the US government stood wary of humanitarian intervention into the affairs of sovereign states, concerned that European empires would use it as a pretext to intervene in the United States.³⁵ But when the United States declared war on Spain in 1898, it soon became a proponent of humanitarian intervention by military force. As Kristin Hoganson has shown, both US officials and the popular press positioned the United States as the masculine savior of feminized Cuba from the rapacious clutches of Spain.³⁶ Unlike European empires who jostled for supremacy through war, US officials argued, the United States only used force to spread civilization, rather than pursue its own self-interest.³⁷

The post–WWI moment marked a new stage of humanitarian activity. The League of Nations claimed oversight over a range of issues, including the traffic in women, further marking the issue as one of universal humanitarian concern rather than national interests. Such framing, however, allowed the US government, as well as other governments, to pursue policies that allowed states to more tightly control the labor and mobility of populations in the name of humanitarian anti-trafficking work.³⁸

Ideas about religion played a crucial, though not always visible, role in conceptions of American sexual exceptionalism. Within the United States, native-born white Protestants often framed Jewish and Catholic immigrants as sexually deviant and unassimilable. Drawing on long-standing anti-Semitic tropes of Jews as “prone to lust” based on their practices of circumcision and polygamy, critics claimed that Jews produced the majority of “filthy publications.”³⁹ Catholic clerical celibacy confounded the gendered and familial norms of American Protestantism. Popular exposés of convent life related torrid tales of young nuns—sometimes Protestant-born girls tricked into conversion by conniving nuns and priests—and held captive for the sexual pleasure of lecherous clergymen.⁴⁰

Countries that Americans associated with Catholicism also bore the taint of sexual immorality. The close ties between the Spanish government and Catholic Church rendered the nation sexually suspicious in the American cultural imagination.⁴¹ American popular culture portrayed France, where Catholicism predominated despite the country’s avowedly secular political culture, as a place of sexual excess and rampant prostitution.⁴² In the early twentieth century, sensationalist white slavery literature decried the “French traders,” “Jew traders,” and “Polish Jewesses” who entrapped native-born white Protestant girls.⁴³ Such narratives positioned Protestantism as inherently sexually moral—and fundamentally American—in contrast to the foreign faiths of Judaism and Catholicism. Thus, on a global scale, American Protestants understood religion, sexual morality, and national identity as closely intertwined.

By the twentieth century, American social hygiene reformers had pledged to study sexual problems “in the spirit and with the methods of modern science, education, and enlightened morality,” rather than from the supposedly religious and sentimental perspective that had animated the social purity reformers who came before them.⁴⁴ Yet the purportedly secular vision of sexual morality they espoused rested on Protestant conceptions of sexual self-control in service of the family and nation.⁴⁵ By recasting Protestant sexual morality in the allegedly secular terms of science, as well as civilization, they argued for its universality, and thus applicability, around the world.

Of course, in many ways, Americans imagined their sexual exceptionalism. Many other countries understood their own sexual mores and policies as the most modern, scientific, and moral. And Americans weren't unique in their concerns over prostitution and trafficking. As many scholars have shown, British, French, Latin American, and Eastern European reformers also attacked prostitution and trafficking with zeal.⁴⁶

But the US government's relationship to prostitution did follow a different path than that of Britain, France, and other European states. First, the United States remained primarily a rural society in the nineteenth century; governments generally implemented licensed prostitution in urban centers. And the US federal government, comparatively weak, left it entirely to local governments to solve questions of prostitution control. Unlike many European powers, the United States did not maintain a strong standing military, the arm of the state that often pushed for licensed prostitution near garrisons. Indeed, the Civil War marked the US military's first small-scale attempt at licensing, when Union commanders oversaw brothels at camps in Memphis and Nashville, Tennessee, but abandoned such projects of prostitution regulation after the war's end.⁴⁷

Moreover, the United States was primarily a settler colonial society until the turn of the century. As imperial powers with administrative colonies, Britain and Spain, for example, had to manage sex between local women of color and white metropolitan troops, administrators, and workers. In contrast, as US federal control expanded westward after the American Civil War, it largely displaced Native American populations and attempted to replace them with white families. Although data on women who sold sex in the West are scarce, white women formed the majority, working in saloons, brothels, and even mobile wagons in the mining towns, construction sites, and military garrisons where single men gathered.⁴⁸ Not until the United States gained its own administrative colonies after the War of 1898 did the federal government begin to seriously address the question of regulated prostitution. It quickly followed the colonial model set by the British, Spanish, and Dutch Empires, and regulated prostitution in the Philippines, Cuba, and Puerto Rico.⁴⁹

Yet, much as the United States tried to "hide" its empire more broadly, US officials carefully swept these experiments with regulation under the rug.⁵⁰ A stated policy of prostitution prohibition (or at least, prohibiting US officials to license it) sent a clear message to the American people, and indeed, the world, that the US empire differed from the British or French model. It did not matter that US military and administrative presence expanded the commercial sex markets in Manila and San Juan after the War of 1898. It did not matter that prohibition as a policy left no room to mitigate the harms of sex for pay between soldiers and locals, which, of course, continued to occur. What mattered was that the sex was less visible to mainland Americans.⁵¹

This sacrifice of women and local communities to maintain the image of exceptional American sexual purity was, as Mary Louise Roberts has termed it, “the price of discretion.”⁵² As the United States gained power on the global stage in the twentieth century, particularly after WWI, officials and non-state reformers further enforced an American vision of right sexuality abroad, which only served to increase their sense of exceptionalism. Using the fight against prostitution and trafficking, powerful Americans attempted to remake other countries in their own image and enhance US global standing in an imperial age.

Seeing Sexual Labor and Migration

In this book, I approach sex trafficking as a “historically contingent concept,” as Philippa Heatherington and Julia Laite call it, rather than a discrete problem.⁵³ Trafficking has long been a flexible and contested category.⁵⁴ Often, state officials as well as non-state reformers have used that flexibility to target some people and leave others be. They mobilized discourses of trafficking at particular moments to obtain their desired political aims, often while occluding those very goals.

Indeed, the flexibility of the terms “white slavery,” “trafficking,” and “prostitution” was the point. US officials and non-state reformers “institutionalized ambiguity,” to use Katrina Quisumbing King’s term, by constructing definitions and policies that accommodated seemingly contradictory ideas.⁵⁵ Prostitution, as a legal term, was slippery. Police could arrest so-called sexually suspicious women for anything from soliciting to loitering to vagrancy, as well as committing a sex act for money. White slavery and trafficking proved similarly flexible. Both state officials and private reform organizations at times treated prostitutes as victims and at other times as criminals, and debated whether they deserved punishment or protection. These unresolved ambiguities allowed officials to use their discretion, to choose, case by case, from a wide range of options.

How reformers and state officials understood the problem of prostitution mattered too. Some saw it as an issue of women’s rights; others, of disease and public health; some believed it to be a problem of morality; still others considered it one of crime and social order; many insisted it originated from the sexually debased foreigners arriving in the United States; and most understood it as some combination of these factors. The way people defined prostitution had ramifications for who should have the authority to enforce laws and policies. Questions of jurisdiction played out over both governmental and geographic territory.

As US officials and non-state reformers institutionalized ambiguity into the structures of prostitution and trafficking policies, such policies gained teeth through discretionary policing. As Anne Grey Fischer has shown, the power of law enforcement officials to target some women as of concern to the state, signaled largely by virtue of their class, race, and ethnic backgrounds, is a cornerstone of police power. Discretion, states Fischer, is the “power to determine whether a woman is hailing a taxi or soliciting motorists for sex.”⁵⁶ Even when women arrested for prostitution used the courts to advocate for themselves, they rarely prevailed.⁵⁷ Migrating women faced similar discretionary power at borders, as immigration officials evaluated their physiognomy, clothes, and comportment for signs of latent immorality.⁵⁸

Yet women who sold sex, like Biaggioni, often articulated other ways of conceptualizing commercial sex and migration. Then and now, people use the word “prostitute” to signify an identity, a means of dividing women into categories of “good” and “bad” according to their sexual behavior. Most women, however, engaged in commercial sex less as a vocation than a gig, something they interspersed with other work, moving in and out of the commercial sex economy. While I use the term “prostitute” to capture the worldview of my actors, I use terms such as “woman who sold sex” and “sex worker” to reflect my analytical voice. Although “sex work” is anachronistic, coined by the sex worker activist Carol Leigh in 1978, it captures many women’s insistence that they sold sex to make money, bringing issues of labor and economics to the fore. Moreover, it positions them as workers: as Heather Berg argues, sex work is not exploitative because it is sexual, but because it is labor under capitalism.⁵⁹

Following several decades of feminist scholarship, I situate prostitution as a form of labor.⁶⁰ Like these scholars, I contend that state policing of prostitution often harmed women, and that even feminist efforts to “rescue” prostitutes or purported trafficking victims frequently made their lives more precarious.⁶¹ This is not to say that women who sold sex did not suffer from violence and coercion. Many did. But such abuses threatened all working women—and especially migrant working women—across industries and locations.

To see the exploitation of women as a problem limited to the sex industry conceals the structural “push and pull” factors that led women to migrate and sell sex.⁶² To set sexual labor and migration apart from all other forms of labor and migration makes the full lives of women in the commercial sex industry harder to see. It sets up a false dichotomy, as Elisa Camiscioli has shown, between “coercion and choice” that erases the structural factors that constrained women’s lives.⁶³ It obscures the growth of global capitalism and its attendant inequalities of gender, race, and class. It ignores the increased flow and new routes of migration, particularly in the twentieth century.⁶⁴ It makes women’s sexual, reproductive, and care work invisible.

The story of Americans’ global sexual reform projects can only be told by bringing disparate sources together from collections within and outside of the United States. The papers of reform organizations in Europe and the United States, alongside US government documents, disclose reformers’ motivations and strategies for attacking sexual vice. French military archives and those of US colonial and military administrations detail how local elites used US anti-prostitution efforts to advance their own goals, while petitions of complaint show working-class people protesting such policies as despotic. League of Nations reports on trafficking and the raw data collected by the League’s American undercover agents show the perspectives of women migrants who moved between various forms of labor, including sexual labor, to support themselves and their families. But they also reveal how Americans inserted their own definitions of trafficking into international conventions, definitions that directly contravened what most women told them.

These sources overwhelmingly privilege the voices of those who sought to inflict an idealized vision of sexual order onto the bodies of women. Empire of Purity is not a story about the local conditions under which women performed sexual labor and their experiences, though it draws on many excellent works that do just that.⁶⁵ When we do see women’s accounts, they are usually mediated: taken from interviews at prisons or recorded as investigative reports—much like the story of Marie Biaggioni, whose life we can only glimpse through the notes of two investigators who spoke with her and her family.

But inscribed in state archives are also forceful claims of people and communities who demanded their rights. People like Rubersinda Herrdia, a Dominican woman who lodged a complaint with the US military government denouncing the injustice of her twenty-five-day prison sentence for prostitution. Or Rosita Hall, on whose behalf the West Indian Labour Union wrote to US officials in the Panama Canal Zone to protest Hall’s arrest for prostitution.

Or Aline Legros, a French woman whose family decried her arrest and forcible vaginal inspection for venereal disease at the hands of US military doctors.⁶⁶

We need to understand how US power inheres in international prostitution and trafficking policies to reckon with the harm that many of these policies have done and continue to do to people who sell sex; specifically, how carceral and violent state intervention into women's lives came to be framed as protection. In following US officials and members of private organizations around the world, I risk simply reinscribing my actors' blind spots, as well as their own sense of self-importance. Yet I still believe that it is important to track the workings of US power, at once more limited than my actors believed it to be but also more expansive and harmful than they could imagine.

INDEX

Numbers in italics denote images

- Abbott, Grace, 204–5
- abolition (of regulated prostitution): and Anglo-American partnerships, 6, 8, 17, 28–29, 43–48, 76, 179, 203–6, 226, 230–31; and feminism, 6, 31–34, 71, 132–33, 218–19, 228, 233; in France, 173; and immigration, 217; in Japan, 226–28; and medicine, 20, 31–34; and old abolitionists, 30, 37; paternalist orientation of, 6, 84, 170, 203, 205, 218–19, 228–29; and regulation, 34–37, 64, 69–71, 132, 135, 173; and sexuality, 22; and social purity discourse, 28–31, 37–38, 41; and white slavery discourse, 76. See also new abolitionists
- abuse, 1, 13, 96, 101, 126, 129, 161
- Afghanistan, 234
- Africa (Africans): Afro-Brazilians, 2; Afro-Caribbean, 141, 143, 158, 161–66; and colonial soldiers, 188; cultural traditions of, 165; enslavement of, 16–17; imperialism in, 16–17; North Africa, 4, 187, 206, 220; North Coast of, 197; and Pan-Africanists, 138; and savagery discourse, 17; and trafficking, 235; West Africa, 187
- African Americans: anti-Blackness, 236; armed forces in the Caribbean, 99–101, 139, 140–43, 150, 157, 161; Black Pattie, 127; Chinese men compared to, 24; commercial sex in African American neighborhoods, 3, 23, 76; club women, 132; and the CTCA, 118–27, 130–33; detention houses for, 130–31; and disease, 135, 145, 192–93; and domestic labor, 91–96; after emancipation, 22–23; and eugenics, 61, 108, 128; hospitals for, 35; as hypersexed, 38, 51–52, 75, 89, 91, 97, 101, 120, 124, 127, 133, 154, 187–90, 193, 232; and immigration, 138, 163; and India, 50; Jim Crow (system), 37–40, 50, 57, 118, 141, 188; and the League of Nations, 203, 211; and lynching, 39; and the Philippines, 52, 65–66, 112; and sexual maturity tropes, 210; sexual violence against Black women, 17, 37, 39, 45, 50, 92, 94, 125, 214; sex workers, 25, 59, 108–9, 124–27; and social purity activists, 39–40, 65; and social purity discourse, 37–39; supposed immorality of, 38; and white slavery discourse, 73–74, 89–90; and white women's suffrage, 22. See also American Expedition Forces (AEF); slavery
- alcohol: and the American Plan, 146, 149, 158; and armed force members, 60, 122; and the ASHA, 110, 115; and concerns about sex work, 30–31; and eugenics, 33; League of Nations investigations and, 216; prohibition of, 6, 50, 70, 104; and white slavery discourse, 76–78. See also Woman's Christian Temperance Union (WCTU)
- American Expeditionary Force (AEF), 169, 172, 179, 186–95
- American Federation for Sex Hygiene, 106

- American Medical Association, 28, 79
- American Plan, the: and abolitionists, 132–33; and alcohol, 146, 149, 158; and American sexual exceptionalism, 134–35; and ASHA, 137–38, 152, 169, 195–96; and the carceral state, 128–29, 136–38, 146–49, 155–60, 163–65; Caribbean legacies of, 163–65; and civilization ideology, 166; and the CTCA, 122, 124; and disease, 182, 190; in the Dominican Republic, 153–55; and labor, 146; and the League of Nations, 200–2; and the Panama Canal Zone, 137–44, 150–53, 163–67; and police, 128, 134–35, 200; protest against, 160–63; and Puerto Rico, 137–39, 146–48, 152, 163–66, 169; and race, 124, 138–48, 152, 157, 159, 163–66, 170–72, 190–94; and regulation, 174, 180, 184, 187; and sexual violence, 129; and social hygiene reformers, 105; and US empire, 136–39, 165–67; and World War One, 133–37, 144, 148–52, 164–67. See also countries by name; medical violence
- American Purity Alliance, 38, 62, 78, 84, 106
- American Purity Alliance (New York Committee for Prevention of State Regulated Vice), 30, 38, 62, 78, 84, 106
- American sexual exceptionalism, 5–12, 17, 40–42, 44, 49, 63–64, 74, 101, 104–5, 134–35, 187–95, 232, 234, 236
- American Social Hygiene Association (ASHA): and the American Plan, 137–38, 152, 195–96; Convention for Suppressing the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others, 230; and the CTCA, 121, 123, 128, 133–34, 152, 169, 172–75; as forerunner of NGOs, 236; and the League of Nations, 8, 200–6, 228–30; and Rockefeller funds, 3, 106, 133, 197–98; and sex trafficking discourse, 197–99, 215–21, 225, 228; and Sexual Hygiene for Young Men pamphlet, 147; and social science, 106–7, 110–18, 121, 198; and undercover research, 3–5, 197–98, 206–12, 228–29; and World War I, 168
- Andrew, Elizabeth Wheeler, 43, 47–50, 59, 61, 71
- Anthony, Susan B., 28, 30, 32
- Argentina, 1, 3, 202, 205, 207, 209, 218
- Asia (Asian): anti-Asian racism, 202–3; Asian men as hypersexual, 187; Asian men's sexual relationships with white women, 211; and Britain, 47; in the Caribbean, 138; immigration law, 79, 216, 224–26; and labor movements, 238; and NGO activism, 236; in nineteenth-century America, 23–24, 43; and opium, 226; in the Philippines, 53, 58, 61–64; as “savages”, 17; and trafficking, 235; and the WCTU, 46; and white slavery discourse, 74, 82, 89. See also League of Nations, Enquiry into Traffic in Women and Children in Asia
- Australia, 57, 134, 186
- Austria, 61
- Baker, Newton, 111, 114, 116, 172
- Barrett, William L., 35
- Belgium (Belgian), 80, 197, 217–18
- Bertha Claihe: The Lovers*, 72–73
- Bethel, Walter, 190
- Biaggioni, Marie Françoise Yvonne (Yvonne Françoise), 1–5, 13–14, 238–39; sisters (Charlotte and Pauline), 1–3
- Black Pattie, 127
- Blackwell, Elizabeth, 29, 32–34, 64
- Blackwell, Emily, 32
- Blatchford, Richard M., 149–50
- Bolden, Mary Lee, 96
- Bowen, J. M., 95
- Braun, Marcus, 80–90
- Brazil, 1–5, 209–10, 213–14, 231, 234–35, 238
- Brent, Charles, 169–70, 179
- brothel keepers (madams or pencions), 2, 18, 25, 27, 36, 53, 74, 83, 87, 94, 123, 126, 181, 198, 210–16, 238
- Brunet, Walter, 206
- Bureau of Social Hygiene, 106–10, 115, 198, 200, 204–5, 216, 219, 221
- Burma, 238
- Burnett, John, 89

- Bush, George W., 234
Bush, Laura, 234
Bushnell, Katharine, 43, 47–50, 59, 61, 70–71, 77, 132–33, 229, 237
Butler, Josephine, 19, 28–29, 32–33, 44, 47–48, 61, 70, 83, 237
- Camick, Marussia, 213
Campbell, David Newton E., 92–93 capitalism, 13–14, 29, 75–76, 148, 161, 199, 212, 228 carceral state (approach) or prisons: and the American Plan, 136–38, 146–49, 163–65; and ASHA, 228–29; avoidance of, 95; and class, 125; and the CTCA, 121; detention houses, 116, 124, 127–33, 156, 159; and disease, 20, 121; in the Dominican Republic, 153–55; and evangelicals, 237; and hospitals, 18–19, 27, 35–38, 47, 56–60, 108, 124, 130–31, 140, 145, 148, 154–64, 237–38; and immigration, 82; and the League of Nations, 218; and NGOs, 234, 236; in the Panama Canal Zone, 98–100; as protection, 15; and racialization of sex, 124–27; resistance to, 14, 160–63; and sex trafficking, 73, 94–95; as solution to prostitution, 6, 23, 80; and white slavery discourse, 87–90; on the WWI homefront, 103–5. See also medical violence
Chamberlain-Kahn Act, 128
chaplains, 66, 154, 169, 179
Chavis, Jay, 94
Chequer, Pedro, 234–35
China (Chinese): British reports on, 42–43, 47; Chinese Mission Home, 24; Immigration Act of 1882, 79; and League of Nations investigations, 221, 224–25, 229, 231; in Panama, 138, 141; in the Philippines, 112; and regulation, 58; as sex workers, 24–25, 75, 79–80, 93
Christianity, 7, 22, 24, 38, 43–46, 51, 60–61, 81, 93, 234, 236 civilization (ideology): and African American soldiers, 171, 174, 179, 184, 189–92; and the American Plan, 166; Anglo-American, 29; and anti-prostitution discourse, 8–11; and anti-white slavery traffic, 81; and ASHA, 137, 220–21, 225–26; Black women in discourse, 38; and British imperialism, 17, 34; and class, 9; disagreements over how to achieve, 169; in the Dominican Republic, 138–39, 160; and France, 169–71, 174, 179, 184, 189–92; and immigration, 77; and India, 44–50; and interracial marriage, 22; Laura Bush on, 234; and “the Orient”, 220; in the Panama Canal Zone, 97–101, 141, 144–45; in the Philippines, 50–53, 60–68, 73; protection of women and children, 67; and public health, 134; in Puerto Rico, 140; and race, 46, 61–62; and social hygiene, 195, 200. See also American sexual exceptionalism civil liberties, 6, 19, 133
Civil War, 11, 17, 21–29, 37, 45, 49, 52, 64
Clarke, Charles Walter, 116, 125, 206, 215 class: and capitalism, 14; elites, 14, 48, 138, 140, 143–46, 152, 156, 160, 163–65, 226; and labor, 32; lower class, 19, 63, 143, 194, 225; middle class, 9, 34, 39–40, 75, 92, 94, 98, 101, 107–8, 127, 131–32, 138; professional, 189–90; and prostitution/trafficking policy, 13, 20, 228; upper class, 19, 21, 61, 108; working class, 14, 108–9, 119, 125, 127, 133–34, 140, 146, 16–63, 198
Clemenceau, Georges, 176
commercial sex: and American sexual exceptionalism, 6; and ASHA, 198–99, 207, 221; in Brazil, 2; and Chinese women, 24, 224; and the CTCA, 123–27, 133–34; in France, 183, 194; and the law, 73; and migration, 4–5, 13–14, 229–31; and the new abolitionists, 16, 73; sex as survival strategy, 163; and social purity discourse, 37–39; toleration of, 5–7; in the United States, 3, 20–28, 75–77, 87–88, 91, 110; and US empire, 12, 53, 57, 60–61, 141, 143, 153, 159; and white slavery discourse, 73–74. See also regulation; prostitution

- Commission on Training Camp Activities (CTCA): abolition work of, 129, 133; and carceral institutions, 121, 127–33; Committee on Protective Work for Girls, 127, 132; and education, 117–20, 147, 174; Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board, 128, 200; Law Enforcement Section on Women and Girls, 115, 130; and the League of Nations, 201–2, 206; and medical research, 134–35, 172, 184, 195; and social hygiene discourse, 152; and surveillance, 182; in World War I, 114–26, 169, 172, 174. See also American Plan, the
- Comstock Laws, 30, 134
- Congregationalists, 29
- consent (consensual): age of, 3, 31, 88, 204, 208, 210, 216, 229; for medical exams, 158; sex, 87, 90–91, 95, 128, 189, 237
- Contagious Diseases Acts, 19, 44, 47
- continence (sexual), 106, 113, 118, 147, 169, 171–79, 195
- Coote, William Alexander, 83–84
- Cramer, Esther, 129
- Crespo, Leonor, 161
- Crowdy, Rachel, 204, 219
- Cuba (Cuban), 9–11, 44, 50, 59, 62, 70, 139–40, 202, 206, 210–11, 218
- Cuevas, Gregoria, 162
- Cuevas, Juana Facunda, 162
- Czechoslovakia, 218
- Daniels, Josephus, 119, 171
- Davis, Ben, 94
- Davis, Katherine Bement, 108–9, 116, 132
- democracy (democratic), 7–8, 49, 104–5, 145, 171, 174, 179, 189, 191, 199, 228
- Democratic Party, 89
- Dillingham Commission, 81–82, 86, 88
- diplomacy (diplomats), 85, 142–43, 150–53, 169–70, 176–80, 194, 206, 220
- disease: American tropes of Panamanians and, 97; and ASHA, 200; “Asiatic”, 58, 64; and the carceral approach, 35, 228–29; and the CTCA, 206; Fit to Fight, 200; in France, 168–87, 192–96; germ theory, 27; gonorrhea, 18, 106, 114, 150–51, 168; granuloma, 157; and India, 47–49; “Indian” syphilis, 112; and Lamarckian evolution, 33; in the Philippines, 56–59, 62–65, 69, 71; and regulation, 26–28, 71; Rockefeller Commission for the Eradication of Hookworm Disease, 150; and sexual exceptionalism, 7; and sexual science, 114; sex workers as vectors of, 128; and social purity discourse, 68, 78; syphilis, 18, 27, 53, 64, 106, 112, 114, 118, 120, 124, 135, 141, 144–51, 156–57, 161, 169, 187; and US Army regulation, 60; Wasserman test, 114, 177, and white slavery discourse, 85. See additional diseases by name; American Plan; medical examinations, prophylaxis; social hygiene
- Dodge, Grace Hoadley, 78, 106
- Dominican Republic, 14, 136–38, 143–44, 148–50, 153–55, 159–66, 206
- Du Bois, W.E.B., 96
- Duque, Matías, 70
- education: and abolition, 31; and African Americans, 92; for Filipinos, 65, 78; medical, 174, 187, 189, 193–94; moral, 132; in Puerto Rico, 147; religious, 17; sex education, 106–7, 117, 119, 121, 189, 194; and social hygiene reform, 10, 60, 196, 201; for women, 19, 32
- Egypt, 1, 197
- Eliot, Charles W., 106
- Ellis, Margaret Dye, 67–68, 71
- Elsie (German), 214–15, 231
- English (language), 2, 18, 227
- eugenics, 31–34, 61, 106, 138, 208, 218; and mental disability discourse, 103, 108, 128–29
- European Plan, 105
- Exner, Max J., 111–13, 119, 172, 199
- Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), 90, 94–96
- Female Guardian Home, 36

- feminism (feminists): abolitionists, 6, 132–35, 173, 203, 205, 218–19, 226, 228, 233; anti-trafficking organizations, 234; and civilization discourse, 46; evangelical, 237; and eugenics, 31–34; and labor, 13, and the League of Nations, 201; and social purity movements, 107
- Flexner, Abraham, 109–10, 172, 179, 216, 229
- Fortune, T. Thomas, 65–66
- Fosdick, Raymond B., 110–16, 127, 172, 201
- France (French): in the American mind, 10, 169–71, 210–11; American partnerships with, 8; brothel culture, 124; and Catholicism, 10, 29, 82; deportation to, 215; French Dominion, 179; and immigration, 1–4, 73, 231, 238; investigations in, 1–4, 85; and labor, 144, 213; and the League of Nations, 203–6, 210–12; Parisian system, 18; and regulation, 5, 11–12, 18–19, 26, 64, 132, 225; and sex trafficking, 10, 80, 82, 98–99; sex workers, 15, 40, 197, 217; US Army in, 199–200, 203–6 (see also chapter 6); and white slavery, discourse, 72–73
- French West Indies, 138
- Galitzi, Christina, 206
- Garrison, William Lloyd, 16, 29–30
- Garrison, William Lloyd Jr., 64
- Gastou (military doctor), 178
- gender: and African Americans, 127; and capitalism, 14; and class, 32, 198; and colonialism, 46, 49, 51, 96–97, 100, 140, 157, 166, 199, 211, 225; double standards, 37; effeminacy, 51; femininity, 51, 127; fluidity, 127; in France, 195; and labor, 212, 231; masculinity, 9, 34, 68, 107, 113, 117, 119, 166, 187, 195; modern girl (concept), 228; and race, 7, 9, 24, 198; and regulation, 41; and religion, 10; and slavery (chattel), 21; transgender individuals, 239; and white slavery discourse, 74, 87, 91, 199
- Gerdron, Emil, 72–73
- Germany (Germans): and regulation, 19, 35, 40; sex workers, 1, 35, 214, 218, 231; and World War I discourse on commercial sex, 117, 129, 134, 146, 174, 184
- Gibbons, Abby Hopper, 30
- Girendos (dancer), 214
- Gledstone, J. P., 29–30, 41
- Gonzalez, Isabel, 97
- Goodman, Herman, 145–48, 152, 156–57, 166–67
- Goodman, Ruth, 156
- Gordon, Maxine, 94–95
- Gorgas, William C., 115
- Gougerot, Henri, 179–80
- Grant, Halbert, 95–96
- Grant, Lottie, 95–96
- Great Britain (British): and the abolition of commercial sex, 6, 40–45, 132, 228, 230; anti-slavery activists, 5; Archbishop of Canterbury, 179; British National Vigilance Association, 83; Cantonment Amendment Act, 48; and China, 224–25; and eugenics, 31–34; Home Department, 221; in India, 45–50, 61–63, 73, 220–21; military, 134, 170, 179–80; Parliament, 19, 48; and the Philippines, 50–51, 58–59; and racial segregation, 141; regulation in British empire, 8, 11–12, 16–20; and social purity discourse, 28–31; and white slavery discourse, 21, 76, 83–84
- Greece, 197, 208
- Guam, 44
- gynecology, 15, 28, 79, 129, 158, 161, 177
- Haims, Loretta, 213
- Haiti, 143, 206
- Hall, Rosita, 14, 161
- Harding, Chester, 152
- Harding, Warren G., 204
- Harper, Frances E. W., 40
- Harris, Eugene, 39
- Harris, Sidney W., 204–5
- Hart, Guy, 94
- Hawai'i, 50, 52, 55, 61, 96, 137
- Hayden, Reynolds, 154–55, 165
- Hazlett, A. Lester, 64–65

- heathenism (concept), 46, 61, 70, 75
Hennequin, Félicien Joseph Louis, 85, 205
Herrdia, Rubersinda, 14, 162
heterosexuality, 7, 30, 101–2, 106, 108, 212, 228, 234
Hindus, 47, 141
HIV/AIDS, 234–35, 239
Hollowell, Rebecca C., 33
homosexuality (homosexuals or same-sex),
7, 52, 87, 108, 117, 127, 130, 137, 183, 212, 228,
234
Hong Kong, 224
Howe, Julia Ward, 28, 30, 209
Hugo, Victor, 38
humanitarianism, 9–10, 91, 166, 198–99, 202,
217, 219, 227–28, 232, 235
Hungary, 57, 80, 218
Huntington, Ellsworth, 139

Ignacio, Joaquina Bondoy, 66
Immigration Act (1882), 79
Immigration Act (1903), 79
Immigration Act (1907), 79, 81, 86–88
Immigration Act (1910), 73, 86–87, 90, 99, 101
India (Indians): and American policy, 42–45, 59–62, 71, 73, 229; in France, 197; and independence movements, 221; Indian Contagious Diseases Act, 47; “Indian” syphilis, 112; in Mexico, 210, 231; regulation in, 8, 59–63; sexually transmitted disease in, 18; and social purity, 45–50;
and the Philippines, 50–51; and the WCTU, 70
International Abolitionist Federation, 28–31,
41, 83–84
International Bureau for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic, 83–84, 201
International Congress for the Abolition of Government Regulation of Prostitution in Geneva, Switzerland, 30
International Congress on the White Slave
Trade, 84
International Temperance Convention, 30

Ireland (Irish), 19, 23, 35
Islam (Muslim), 51, 58; Moros, 58
Italy (Italians), 1–2, 40, 57, 197, 214

Jackson, Alice, 94
Jamaica, 92, 100, 141, 149, 153
Janney, Oliver E., 59, 78
Johnson, Bascom, 110, 115–16, 122, 145, 184,
202–21, 224, 227
Johnson, Dick, 94
Johnson, Jack, 95–96
Johnson, William E., 60–61
Jones Act, 144
Jones, Sissieretta (Black Patti), 127
Judaism (Jews), 2–3, 10, 75, 77, 80–83, 202–3,
209, 215, 217; Yiddish, 2, 206, 209

Keefe, Daniel, 85–87, 93
Kern, Howard, 145–46, 156, 164
Kerns, George L., 154
Keyes, Edward L., 172, 177–79, 190–91
Kinsie, Paul Michael, 2–5, 121–27, 197–98,
206–15, 231
Kitchell, Charles, 34
Kite, Elizabeth S., 129

labor: of African American women, 91, 126; and the American Plan, 146; and the archive, 5; and Asian immigrants, 24–25, 74–75, 79, 138, 141, 221, 224; and the Bush administration, 234; child, 22; and consensual sex, 37, 88–89, 198, 205, 229–33;
and empire, 18; European, 80; Filipina women and, 53; and gender, 198; gold roll and silver roll, 98, 141; and gynecology, 158; and humanitarianism, 10; in industry, 120; and Irish women, 23; and the League of Nations, 226, 231; and migration, 1, 4, 12–15, 205, 212–17; movements for, 138; and NGOs, 235–36; physical nature of sex work, 76; and protest,
160–63; as punishment, 129; railroad,
24, 141; and regulation, 34; sexual, 1, 101,
237–39; and social purity rhetoric, 37–40;

- US Department of Labor, 84, 204; wage slavery, 22; and white slavery discourse, 90, 210; of WWI soldiers, 187, 190
- Ladies' National Association, 19
- Latin America, 11, 96–97, 137–38, 148, 152, 165–66, 217, 220, 226
- Latvia, 215
- League of Nations: 1921 Convention, 202, 204; 1927 report, 198–99, 215, 219, 230; 1932 report, 198–99, 220–21; 1933 International Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women of Full Age, 229; Advisory Committee on Traffic in Women and Children (Trafficking Committee), 4, 198, 202–5, 215, 218–20, 226–29; Anglo-American Alliance, 203–6; Covenant of the League of Nations, 201–2, 226; Enquiry into Traffic in Women and Children in Asia (the East), 198, 219–23; investigators, 3–5, 14, 206–12, 238–39; reports, 215–19; Special Body of Experts, 205, 217–19; and trafficking policy, 10; Travelling Commission, 220–21, 224–27; and US commercial sex policies, 8, 198–203, 228–29; women speak to representatives of, 212–15
- Leavitt, Mary Clement, 47
- Legros, Aline, 15, 168, 186
- lesbians, 130
- Liberatore, Gaetano, 168
- Lithuania, 215
- Livermore, Mary, 30
- Lobos, Georgiana, 214
- Lotus Club, 235
- Luisi, Paulina, 203, 205, 218
- MacArthur, Arthur Jr., 59, 62–63
- Malay Peninsula, 224, 231
- Mann Act (White Slave Traffic Act), 73, 86–96, 99, 101. See also white slavery
- Mann, James R., 87–90
- Maricopas, 25
- marriage, 21–24, 37–40, 46, 59, 64–66, 73, 87, 95–98, 110, 118, 123, 213, 233–24
- Marshall (British Provost), 180–81
- masculinity, 9, 34, 41, 68, 105, 107, 113, 117, 119, 166, 187, 195
- masturbation, 52, 117, 137
- Maus, Isadore, 217
- McCormack, Arthur T., 150, 152
- McKinley, William, 52, 61, 63, 68
- medical examinations (inspections): in Britain, 19–20, 32, 48–49; and carceral approaches to policing prostitution, 35, 128–33; in China, 43; during Civil War, 26–27, 52; in the Dominican Republic, 153–55, 159, 162; expensive, 200; in France, 18, 168, 173, 178, 181–86, 194; in India, 43, 47–49; in Japan, 226; at the Mexican border, 104, 111–13; in Panama, 143, 150–55, 158–61; in the Philippines, 53–63, 67–69, 73; protest against, 15, 160–63; in Puerto Rico, 140, 145–50, 155; and reform organizations, 233; and regulation, 5, 17–20, 25–29; in South America, 207–8; of US soldiers, 117, 119, 122, 173–74
- medical violence, 136, 155–60; surgical rape, 20, 48, 168
- Methodists, 51, 64
- Mexico (Mexican), 25, 95, 104, 111–14, 130, 150, 172, 205, 210–13, 231
- Michel, Florencia, 136, 160
- Miner, Maude, 103, 116, 132
- Monelle-Mansell, Nancy, 33
- Mormons, 75
- Morocco, 187
- Morrow, Prince A., 78, 106
- Munson, Edward Lyman, 52–53, 56
- National American Woman Suffrage Association, 64
- National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, 96
- National Association for the Repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts, 19
- national identity, 9–10, 97, 102, 165, 167, 198, 212
- nationalism, 50, 117, 138, 165, 199, 209, 217–20

- Native American (Indigenous or Indian), 11, 24–25, 74, 143, 191, 165. See individual nations by name
- Navajo, 25
- Netherlands, the (Dutch), 11, 203, 225, 228
- new abolitionists, 5, 17, 29–33, 37–38, 48, 73.
See also chapter 1
- New England Watch and Ward Society, 84
- New York Female Moral Reform Society, 21
- New Zealand, 134, 186
- non-governmental organizations (NGOs), 202, 219, 221, 233–37
- Norcross, Millie, 129
- Oceania, 17
- opium, 6, 70, 226
- oral sex, 2, 124, 127, 169, 184, 211–12
- Ortiz, Celina, 162
- Owings, Chloe, 206
- Page Act (1875), 24, 79
- Panama Canal Zone: and the American Plan, 137–44, 163–67; and labor, 14, 160–63, 213–15; and medicine, 148–60, 163–67; Panama Canal Zone Board of Health (Health Department), 152; Republic of Panama, 97–101, 137, 141, 152–54, 158, 166; and white slavery discourse, 74, 96–101
- Pasarell, L. Yordán, 156
- paternalism, 6, 84, 170, 203, 205, 218–19, 229
- Pershing, John J., 66, 111–12, 172–83, 187, 190–93
- Philippines, the (Filipino/a): Board of Health, 56–57; Catholics in, 51; Congressional Committee on the Philippines, 67; “filthy” Filipina discourse, 45, 62–66, 71; Filipino men as rapacious, 51; and immigration, 224; and opium prohibition, 226; Philippine Republic, 53; Philippine Revolutionary forces, 53; regulation in, 8, 11–12, 53–59, 69–71, 73, 83, 96, 137, 140; resistance to empire, 140; and social purity discourse, 50–53, 66–71, 104, 111–13; as testing ground, 56; and US empire, 44–45; and US military personnel, 59–62, 111–13, 119
- Pindor, Karl, 220, 227
- Poland (Polish or Pole), 10, 202, 215–20
- police: and abolitionists, 32; and the American Plan, 128, 134–35, 200; and archives, 237; in Britain, 180; in the Dominican Republic, 136, 154, 159; in France, 27, 168, 176, 181–84; harassment, 5, 72, 215, 233, 238; and the League of Nations, 200, 218; and the Mann Act, 86–95; military police, 183, 186, 190; and NGOs, 236; in Panama, 100–1, 142, 148–49, 153, 158–62, 214; in the Philippines, 53, 56, 63; in Puerto Rico, 146, 164; and regulation, 18–20; and social evil hospitals, 27, 34–35; and social hygiene activists, 115, 121; and social science, 107–10, 121–28; and state power, 13; and surveillance, 2; toleration of commercial sex, 3; undercover agents, 3–4, 14, 47, 73, 77, 80–81, 121, 197, 204–7, 220–21, 229; in the United States, 23–24, 27; and white slavery discourse, 84; on the WWI homefront, 103, 121–28. See also medical violence
- Popenoe, Paul, 218–19
- Powell, Aaron Macy, 30, 32, 34, 38, 41, 49, 51, 62, 78
- procurers (traffickers or pimps or souteneurs): and African American women, 126; and the American Vigilance Association, 106; and domestic law, 86–90; in France, 179; and immigration, 79–87; and League of Nations investigations, 4, 198, 202, 206–10, 213–16, 229–30; in Panama, 96, 99–100; in the Philippines, 112; and sexual self-control, 120; Society of Sanitary and Moral Prophylaxis, 78; and the UN, 230; and white slavery discourse, 73–74; women as, 1–3, 238–39
- prophylaxis: advances in, 121; and African Americans, 192–95; and expansion of medical policing, 133; condoms, 134, 169; defined, 112; and France, 169, 174, 176, 178,

- 184–87, 192–95; in Panama, 148; process and strategy, 119–20; in Puerto Rico, 147, 157; restrictions on, 134; Society of Sanitary and Moral Prophylaxis, 78
- prostitution: and moral reclaimability, 19; and soldiers' morale, 61–66, 109, 113; terminology, 12–13; as threat to US war effort, 171. See also regulation; commercial sex
- protection of women and children, 85, 183; racial narratives of, 51, 75, 89, 188–91
- Protestantism (Protestants), 7–10, 17, 24, 29, 45–46, 61, 101, 107, 179; evangelicals, 21, 233–37. See denominations by name
- public health: and abolition, 17, 232–35; and the American Plan, 134–38, 143–45, 149, 153–55, 158–59, 164–66; and ASHA, 106–7; and defining prostitution, 13; and immigration, 77, 79; international, 235; journals, 34, 41; and law, 216; and military health, 179, 186; in the Philippines, 56–57, 61, 69–70; and policing, 35, 109–10, 128–30; and regulation, 26–27, 225; and sex education, 119; and social hygiene, 104; and venereal disease, 20; and white slavery discourse, 77–81. See also American Plan, the
- Puerto Rico (Puerto Ricans): and the American Plan, 137–39, 152, 163–66, 169; annexation of, 50; House of Representatives, 164; and immigration, 97; and incarceration, 154–60; and labor/protest, 160–63; and medicine, 59; regulation in, 11, 96, 139–50; Rotary Club of San Juan, 163; San Juan Woman's Christian Temperance Union, 163. See also War of 1898
- race: and the American Plan, 138–48, 152, 157, 159, 163–66; and American sexual exceptionalism, 187–95; Anglo-Saxon, 7, 17, 29, 44–45, 51, 141, 184; degeneration, 184; disease associated with nonwhites, 69, 117, 157–58; and fears of sexual predators, 89; and immigration, 81; interracial sex, 11, 25, 45, 56–59, 65, 74, 111–12, 126, 166, 187–91, 210–12, 225; and Jews, 80; Jim Crow (system), 37–40, 50, 57, 118, 141, 188; and labor, 91–92, 95, 212; and Mexican borderlands, 111–14; mixed race, 51, 127, 140, 144, 210, 231; and NGOs, 234–7; non-discrimination, 226; Orientalism, 45, 62, 221; racial hierarchies, 7, 18, 21, 26, 37–38, 58, 96–102, 198–99; racialized sexuality, 38, 51–52, 75, 89, 91, 97, 101, 120, 124–27, 133, 152, 154, 187–90, 193, 232; segregation, 23, 25, 57, 92, 110, 118, 124–25, 130, 141, 150, 153, 157, 159, 169, 188, 190, 192, 208; and sex trafficking, 202–3, 209–10, 225, 236; and sexual self-control, 119, 171; and social purity discourse, 39, 51–52; “tropical or Latin”, 137, 166; and white slavery discourse, 94. See also African Americans; civilization (ideology); eugenics; whiteness
- rape (sexual violence): accusations of, 162, 177–78, 183; against Black women, 17, 37, 39, 45, 50, 92, 94, 125; against women who sold sex, 214; and the American Plan, 129; fear of soldiers committing, 52, 69, 117, 125, 137, 143, 147, 188–91; as material and symbolic concern, 162; surgical rape, 20, 48, 168
- Reconstruction, 16, 30
- Red Cross, 145–46, 160
- reform organizations, 8–9, 12, 14, 21, 23, 46, 106, 232, 238. See individual organizations by name
- regulation (of prostitution): and abolition, 34–37, 64, 69–71, 132, 135, 173; and approved sexual outlets, 52, 111; in British empire, 8, 11–12, 16–20; and China, 58; and disease, 26–28, 71; European Plan for, 105; and France, 5, 11–12, 18–19, 26, 64, 132, 225; and Germany, 19, 35, 40; in India, 8, 59–63; International Congress for the Abolition of Government Regulation of Prostitution in Geneva, Switzerland, 30; League of Nations recommendations for,

- regulation (of prostitution) (continued)
221–28; in the Philippines, 8, 11–12, 53, 56–59, 69–71, 73, 83, 96, 137, 140; public-private partnerships and state power, 8;
in Puerto Rico, 11, 96, 139–50; réglementation (Parisian system), 5, 18–19, 26–27, 109, 169, 173; in Spain, 11, 225; and yellow tickets, 140
- religion: and abolition, 20–21, 29, 31, 44;
Asian religions, 45; and civilization discourse, 9, 46; and education, 17, 174; ethnoreligious groups, 58; and foreign-ness, 82; in France, 173; and purity reformers, 78, 106, 163; and race, 219; and social hygiene, 9–10, 237. See other religions by name or denomination
- Republican Party, 87, 200
- respectability: and African Americans, 39, 65–66, 91–92, 96, 119, 132–33, 188–89; and
Chinese women, 24; and the CTCA, 117,
132–33; and employment, 36, 214; and the French, 177–80, 188–91; and immigration, 214, 225; and male reformers, 21; neighborhoods, 23; in Panama, 99; and Puerto Ricans, 140, 146, 150, 161, 163; and white slavery discourse, 89, 105; and white women's rights, 28
- Reynolds, James Bronson, 78
- Rippin, Jane Deter, 116, 130
- Rockefeller, John D. Jr., 3, 104–10, 117, 133, 168, 198, 200, 229. See also Bureau of Social Hygiene
- Rockefeller Foundation, 106, 115
- Roe, Clifford, 87, 106
- Roman Catholics, 10, 29, 51, 56, 61, 64, 67, 75, 82
- Romania (Romanians or Roumanians), 57, 61, 214
- Roosevelt, Theodore, 66–71, 78–79, 84, 139
- Root, Elihu, 61, 68, 84
- Russell, Gordon D., 89
- Russia, 1, 57, 61, 77, 213, 218, 220, 224–25;
Soviet Union, 202
- Ryder, Emily Brainerd, 47
- Sainte-Croix, Ghénia Avril de, 203
- Sanger, William, 26
- Savage, George, 94
- Scott, Ruby, 94–95
- Second Great Awakening, 20–21
- sexual science (sexology), 10–11, 107–8, 113–14, 138
- Sims, Marion J., 28, 79
- slavery (sexual): and India, 49–50; “Oriental”, 43; and the Philippines, 61, 63;
“yellow” (Chinese), 24, 75, 224
- slavery (unfree labor): anti-slavery activists in Britain, 5, 17, 19; anti-slavery activists in the USA, 20–23, 28–32; in Brazil, 209;
in the Caribbean, 138, 140; chattel, 5,
16–17, 20–21, 37, 49, 74; emancipation, 17, 22, 32; and gynecology, 28; linked to prostitution, 21–23; metaphor for exploited laborers, 24; mythology of, 37; in social purity rhetoric, 37–40
- Smith, Hattie, 103–5, 120–21
- Snow, William F., 107, 115–16, 195, 201, 205–7, 211, 215–20
- Snowden, Thomas, 154–55, 159
- Social Evil hospitals, 27, 35–36, 237
- social evil ordinances, 26–28, 31, 34–36
- social hygiene: in the Caribbean, 152, 165–66;
in France, 168–72, 177, 179, 181, 184, 187,
194–96; and the League of Nations,
198–201, 212, 225; military, 53–57, 60; and NGOs, 237; and race, 124; and regulation, 6; and social science, 10, 17, 104–15,
132–35, 140; tropical, 69; and the US
Army, 118–21
- sodomy (anal sex), 117, 211–12
- Somerset, Isabella (Lady Henry), 48, 59
- Spain (Spanish), 147, 152, 183, 197, 203, 209,
211, 225; and Catholicism, 10, 51, 56, 64, 67; language, 143, 147, 152, 209; and regulationism, 11, 225; sex workers (in),
1, 57, 183, 197, 211; and trafficking, 203.
See also War of 1898
- Special Hospital for Women, 140, 145
- Spencer, Anna Garlin, 48, 78

- Stanton, Elizabeth Cady, 28
Stapleton, Mamie, 103–5, 120–21
Stead, William T., 31, 76–77
sterilization, 114, 138, 158, 193
Stone, Lucy, 30
Stuntz, Homer C., 51
suffrage, 19, 22, 31, 39–40, 48, 61, 64, 67–68, 132, 135; disenfranchisement, 39, 165
Sundquist, Alma, 220, 227
Sweden (Swedish), 40, 218, 220
Sweet, Owen, 58–59, 62–63
Switzerland, 30, 218
- Taft, William Howard, 87, 90
tampons, 129, 157
temperance, 17, 30–31, 38, 46, 60–61, 76.
See also Woman's Christian Temperance Union (WCTU)
Terrell, Mary Church, 39–40 trafficking (sex): 1949 UN Convention, 230; and Africa, 235; and ASHA, 197–99, 215–21, 225, 228; and Asia, 235; and the carceral state, 73, 94–95; and class, 13, 20, 228; feminist anti-trafficking organizations, 234; and France, 10, 80, 82, 98–99; International Bureau for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic, 83–84, 201; League of Nations Advisory Committee on Traffic in Women and Children (Trafficking Committee), 202–5, 218–20, 226–29; and race, 202–3, 209–10, 225, 236; and Spain, 203. See also League of Nations initiatives and conventions; Mann Act (White Slave Traffic Act); procurers (traffickers or pimps or souteneurs); white slavery
Traveler's Aid Society, 78
Trujillo, Rafael, 165
Turkey (Turkish), 57, 197
Turner, George Kibbe, 77
- Unitarians, 78
United Nations (UN), 230, 236; 1949 Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others, 230
urology, 172
Uruguay (Uruguayan), 203, 205, 207, 211, 218
US Army: Army Medical Corps, 156; and ASHA, 4; in the Civil War, 26–27, 52; and the CTCA, 115–19; in France, 170–184, 189, 193, 195; general orders, 59, 173–76, 188; in Panama, 150; in the Philippines, 53, 56, 63–68; Surgeon General, 115, 117, 152; and the WWI homefront, 103. See also American Expeditionary Force (AEF)
US Attorney General, 145–46, 160, 164.
See also Kern, Howard
US Civil War, 11, 17, 21–29, 37, 45, 49, 52, 64
US Committee on International Relations, 235
US Department of Commerce, 84, 92–93
US Department of Labor, 84, 204
US House of Representatives, 24, 67, 79–81, 86–90, 115, 128, 144, 152–53, 200
US Immigration Bureau, 80–88
US Marines, 143–44, 149, 154, 159, 162, 189, 206
US National Guard, 118, 168
US National Vigilance Association, 78, 81, 84, 106
US Navy, 119, 150, 154, 171; Naval Surgeon, 154–55
US Senate, 86, 91, 114, 164, 200
US Supreme Court, 86–88
vagrancy laws, 12, 22, 100, 103, 122
Valdes, Ramón, 148
Valera, Carmen, 161–62
Vietnam (Vietnamese), 235
Villa, Pancho, 111
- Wales, 32, 180
Walker, George, 172, 174, 177, 180, 184, 187–93
Walkinshaw, Ruth, 206, 214
War of 1898, 8–12, 44, 55, 50, 69, 139
West Indies, 98, 136, 138, 141, 150; West Indian Labour Union, 14, 161

- white slavery: the American narrative of, 20, 83, 101–2, 135; Black women missing in narratives of, 91–96; domestic (US), 86–91; feminized, 80; flexibility of term, 12; and France, 10, 173, 177; and immigration, 79–82; international campaigns against, 83–86; International White Slave Treaty (1904), 86; and the League of Nations, 200–6, 210, 227; as near contradiction in terms, 74; origins of term, 74–79; in the Panama Canal Zone, 96–101; and social purity discourse, 71–74; and social reformers, 103–6, 110; and the WCTU, 47. See also abolition; Mann Act (White Slave Traffic Act); prostitution; trafficking (sex)
- whiteness, 80, 102, 140, 163, 191, 209
- Whitin, Frank, 206
- Willard, Frances, 41, 44, 46
- Wilson, Henry J., 29–30
- Wilson, Woodrow, 100, 104, 115, 122, 170–71, 198–201, 204
- Win, Kthi, 238
- Winslow, Caroline Forbes, 33
- Woman's Christian Temperance Union (WCTU), 30–33, 41, 44–50, 59, 61, 64, 67, 70, 77, 145, 163
- women's rights, 5, 12, 17, 20, 28–34, 61, 84, 143, 205, 219, 228–29
- Woodhull, Victoria, 30
- Working Girls Society, 78
- World War One: and American exceptionalism, 12; and the American Plan, 133–37, 144, 148–52, 164–67; and ASHA, 4, 110, 133, 137, 197–200; and the carceral state, 103–4; and the CTCA, 206; and “dangerous” French women, 211; and homosexuality, 117; and immigration, 1, 90, 212–15; and the League of Nations, 10, 200, 220; and oral sex, 124; and prostitution policy, 8, 102–4, 113, 205, 236; and racialized sexuality, 124–27, 166–67; sex and democracy linked in, 8; and social hygiene, 104; soldiers imagined as white, 139; and white slavery discourse, 101. See also American Expeditionary Force (AEF); France (French)
- World War Two, 148, 195, 230
- Worthington, George, 206, 210–13, 231
- Yiddish, 2, 206, 209
- Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), 29, 107, 111, 115, 119, 172, 174, 189, 199
- Young Women's Christian Association (YWCA), 206
- Young, Hugh, 172–82, 189–92
- Yuma, 25